

https://dspace.org/

What constitutes a 'risky' identity? : the social representation of the risk of contracting HIV among South African students.

Stadler, Sarah Louise

2011-04-04
http://hdl.handle.net/10539/9322

Downloaded from a DSpace repository. https://dspace.org/

Contents

DECLARATION i
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS ii
ABSTRACT iii

CHAPTER 1: Introduction 1

1.1 Introduction 1
1.2 Research Aims 2
1.3 Research Questions 2
1.4 Rationale 2
1.5 Definition of key terms 6
1.6 Structure of the research report 7

CHAPTER 2: Literature Review 8

2.1 Introduction 8
2.2. A critique of some of the theories utilised to understand sexual behaviour 8
2.3 Social Representations Theory 10
2.4 Perceived Invulnerability: I am not at risk, 'others' are 12
2.5 Developing an 'Identity': Who I am in a context of social representations 15
2.6 Youth: Young people at risk of HIV infection? 16
2.7 Gender: Differential HIV risk? 18
2.8 Race 24
2.9 Socio-economic status 25
2.10 Substance and alcohol use 27

CHAPTER 3: Research Design and Methodology 30

3.1 Research design 30
3.2 Research procedure 30
3.2.1 Participants and sampling method 30
3.2.2 Procedure 32

3.2.3 Data Collection Methods 33
3.3 Data Analysis 35
3.4 Ethical considerations 35
3.5 Researcher reflexivity and the researcher's experience 36

CHAPTER 4: Findings and Discussion 40

4.1. Introduction 40
4.2. Risky behaviour: A central factor in the social representation of a 'risky identity' 41
4.3 Personal attributes as elements of risk 61
4.3.1 Age: Are the youth at risk? 62
4.3.2 Exploring the social representations of gender in the HIV epidemic 73
4.3.3 HIV risk: The social representations and discourses regarding race 101
4.4 Risky behaviours in risky environments 111
4.5 Perceptions of personal risk? 116

CHAPTER 5: Conclusions 123

5.1 Summary of findings 123
5.2 Strengths and limitations of the research 127
5.3 Recommendations for future research 128
5.4 Conclusion 128

REFERENCES 129

APPENDICES 137