

https://dspace.org/

Caught in the "nest" : teachers' experiences of layered regulation of quality improvement : a case study of teachers working in five "achieving" public secondary schools in Gauteng.

Cereseto, Anthea

2010-02-26T06:44:31Z
http://hdl.handle.net/10539/7567

Downloaded from a DSpace repository. https://dspace.org/

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

My thanks go firstly to my supervisor, Professor Yael Shalem, for her invaluable expert guidance, inspiration and consistent support. I learnt so much from her during the process of writing this dissertation. I owe her an enormous debt of gratitude.

Many colleagues, friends and family members contributed in so many ways.

I thank the participants in Professor Shalem's PhD study group, which I was fortunate to be invited to join, for stimulating my academic thinking and inspiring me to complete my writing.

I am grateful to the teachers in my school and in Naptosa whose voiced frustrations in school discussion and union debates provoked me to embark on these studies and who throughout the writing process engaged critically with the ideas I was working with.

I express my sincere appreciation to all the teachers in the five schools that made up the case study who gave up their limited personal time to respond openly, honestly and creatively to the questions put to them. Without their willing co-operation and insightful comments I would not have been able to gather the rich data that was essential to a worthwhile study.

I thank Gill Hannant for her expert transcriptions of interviews and faultless proof-reading.

Finally I thank my husband, children and grandchildren whose interests I neglected as I stole time from them to complete this project. I thank them for their love, patience, understanding, support and encouragement.

WitsETD