6. The technique for coordinating the functions of the three tiers of government should be improved.

The study of external financial control undertaken above reveals many defects in the coordination of functions and financial relations. The South Africa Act 1909 laid down the general pattern on which functions were subsequently allocated, and the Republic of South Africa Constitution Act 1910 merely repeated the former constitutional delegation of functions. The original Provincial boundaries were determined by war and historical accident, and remain unaltered even though central government policy and local execution of policy could be better undertaken in certain spheres without the constitutional restraints arising from provincial autonomy. Reference has already been made to the views of certain authorities who frankly stated that some policies could be better executed if the Provincial Council did not exist. The unsatisfactory and haphazard nature of external financial control by the Provinces over local authorities also seem to confirm that a central department of State could enact a better system of financial control than that revealed throughout this work.

One of the main reasons for the unsatisfactory nature of external financial control is the absence of permanent machinery for the coordination of functions. The original thirteen departments of State have grown to over forty; Provincial and Municipal departments have also grown. In addition, numerous extra departmental Government organisations have come into being which complicate the administrative machinery, such as Control Boards, State-controlled Corporations, planning authorities, development boards of various kinds. Legislation to cover all this administrative growth is extensive but such growth has taken place by adding departments one by one on a piecemeal basis to satisfy immediate apparent needs without a proper co-ordination and integration of functions and finances. It is not uncommon for local authorities to obtain authorities from six separate departments before relatively simple local tasks can be finalised.

The increasing complexity of national and local problems has caused the Central Government and Provincial Administrations to act in spheres which in the less complex period before 1939 were regarded as purely local problems. Throughout the world central-local relations have undergone profound changes. Local functions cannot be executed without taking into account national and provincial policy, but the legislative and administrative machinery for interpreting and executing policy is so complex that the cry of local authorities for greater autonomy is being more frequently heard, and there is a growing demand for permanent machinery for consultation and coordination. The Provincial Consultative Committee already referred to above and its successor, the Administrators Conference, are too restrictive in scope, and deal mainly with coordination in purely Provincial legislation e.g. traffic, teachers salaries etc. The various Provincial Municipal Associations discuss proposed legislation affecting local authorities and the United Municipal Executive is consulted on proposed national legislation. Officials' organisations such as the Institute of Town Clerks, the Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants and the Institute of Public Administration provide a forum for coordination in certain respects. Furthermore, the Transvaal Local Government Advisory Board has assisted in the task of coordination. There is lacking, however, a continuous method of integrating the multiplicity of controls which are continually being added on an ad hoc basis, the result of which has been the haphazard structures seen in Annexures A and B to the one sphere of financial control. Although the Borstenhagen and Schumann investigations will make certain recommendations on functions and finances, their terms of reference are too restricted to encompass a general analysis of the ad hoc growth of government. These commissions were appointed as a result of immediate pressures to deal with specific problems which had arisen. There is a need for a far-reaching enquiry into the entire machinery of government in South Africa.
