philosophic, expressionist poem - Droogte in die Karoo.

The poet has attempted to express a very big subject. He achieves a certain grandeur by the slow, heavy rhythm and with severe metaphors. He has maintained this grandeur by omitting any reference to the small human being. Yet it is interesting to note that the almost surrealistic image of the minute ants adds a gruesome horror to the otherwise majestic whole:

Our hierdie wêre het die son so groot vergulde toorts met walm van roet gewaai, en alles is in die verwronge dood so groep verstilk en vasgedrui.

Windduwels dans spiraalend in die gloed wat bo die verste flikker-mete trill;
hoe dun vloeï in dié land die sap en bloed waar die lowe so onwaker beur en ril.

Die doornie is hier uitgekalwe tot diep longis van gelatenheid en pyn;
die grays-gemerete deur die dore geknoei, woel miere in die ingewelde brain.

Ver strok die vlakte soos 'n skitter-see wat in sy keuvelgolwinge verdov;
hoe stemloos roep die branding in sy wou, hoe sing die dor ballade van die stof!

Die dag is eindeelik monosoom leeggebloei after 'n verre doringstrui sa morg; en teen die uitgebrande maan verwloeï in windelose skemerings tot nag.

Van Heerden had not really expressed the Karroo, but he has used it as a magnificent symbol of an all-destructive drought. And therefore, because the poet has not attempted to express or recreate the Karroo, but because he has used it to express something else, he has far more control over the Karroo and has consequently given a more striking and a more permanent poem than the others.

It would seem that if the Karroo is to be used in art in a significant manner, it must be used as a symbol.
Chapter 6:

SYMBOL OF AFRICA:

In the first chapter it was pointed out that the development in painting and literature has been more or less identical. In the course of the essay the work of Wenning - D.F. Malherbe; Leipoldt - Naudé has been classified as representative of the first realistic or impressionistic group; and that of Pierneef - C.M. van den Heever as representative of the second "semi-realistic" group. In the third group - accepted by the critics as the most important from the aesthetic point of view - we find two artists who again show noteworthy parallels in their work. Both of these artists - M.P. van Wyk Louw and Alexis Preller - have frequently been regarded as the most important in South Africa in their respective fields. (1).

In Digters van Dertig Opperman enumerates the tendencies and characteristics of that particular period. Although this work is exclusively concerned with poetry, the characteristics which Opperman discusses generally apply to the work of the painters who are contemporary with the poets, although their best work may have been produced after the 1930's.

Opperman focuses the attention on the following points:

There is an inclination towards freedom from the patriotic and the local although these aspects are not entirely excluded. But whereas the earlier work was inspired almost entirely by the immediate surroundings, conditions and events, the work of "Thirty" strives towards a more universal expression. Many of the artists are city dwellers and so have less direct contact with the rural. Simultaneously the field of interest widens. The artists now consider oriental, exotic, philosophic and religious arguments, and present their own personal views which may be in absolute conflict with the accepted opinions of the community /

1). Opperman, Antonissen, Grovë, Bokhorst, Morwe Scholtz are a few of the critics who have referred to these two artists as being the most important in South Africa.
community in such matters. Yet the artists now dare to defy public opinion far more boldly than their "eccentric" forerunner - C. Louis Leipoldt. The artists become strongly aware of their artistic mission, calling or compulsion. They feel that they are apart from the general populace, and that they (particularly the poets) are dutybound to be the spiritual leaders of their people. Yet they often feel that they are misunderstood and consequently ignored. The lonely wandering artist has replaced the popular artist; the self-conscious prophet has taken the place of the simple peoples' mouth piece: "Ons is die geeste wat dwaal" writes N.P. van Wyk Louw (2) and one is very frequently conscious of an over emphasis of this isolation. The theme is used repeatedly, but often unconvincingly in the early poetry of the period. Sometimes this conviction of being an all-important, prophesying, egocentric individual threatens to become an invaluable cult or pose.

One of the most important aspects of "Thirty" is the greatly improved craftsmanship. Whereas inferior techniques were excused before because the country's culture was so young and negligible, art is now produced for art's sake and it had to be able to hold its own outside the national borders.

Consequently the artistic activity as such is of prime importance. To write or to paint is no longer a hobby or a pastime to fill a few idle hours. Now it is a vocation or a profession. These professional artists are very conscious of their work. Some may have no other work besides, while others are associated with Universities or schools where they expound on their chosen field of study (3). Several write critical essays in an endeavour to enlighten the public about art in general and about the work of their contemporaries in particular. (4).

3). There had, however, already been "full time" painters: e.g. Hugo Maude; Frans Gerber; Pierneef; Muggie Laubscher; Irma Stern.
4). B.G. C.M. van den Heever; W.E.G. Louw; N.P. van Wyk Louw; Walter Battiss.
During this period mild individualism makes way for a much stronger personal expression and revelation. The artists experience the desire to break away from traditional forms and expressions which were in common use in the arts in South Africa. They wish to express an individual emotional life. As a result of this sometimes over conscious hyper individualism, nationalism - or more accurately chauvinism - in art is banned from the work by these men. The poetry becomes more intimate and revealing of the poet's most personal and deepest sensations and experiences. The poets begin to doubt the traditional forms of the Calvinistic religion and are in conflict with God (5). In painting one may see a parallel to this in what may be called an exploration of the subconscious (6).

As "a corrective for the interference with the spiritual" (7) the visual sensations and impressions are expressed more strongly and vividly. Colours are stronger (8), physical strength is admired (9) and - particularly in poetry - there is generally a glorification of earthly beauty, although depicted from a personal and original point of view.

According to Opperman the most important aspect of the renewal brought about by "Thirty" is "'n strewe na suiwerheid van vorm." (10). This results in a complete self-revelation in a technically very competent form which is a general characteristic in the work of this phase. The artist as a person, an individual now dares to reveal his innermost self. He is no longer in the background describing a visual reality or an event. He is now part of it, experiencing it acutely and compelling the / the receiver to experience the emotion too. The art of "Thirty" has a distinct psychological impact and an intellectual quality which was absent in the earlier work.

Because these artists frequently wish to express a reality other than the visual they often create symbols to express an abstract conception. Many of these symbols are universal and contemporary which can be found again in European poetry and painting. But a few are indigenous. Deane Anderson (11) and Walter Battiss (12) point out that although European painters were needed to show the local men the aesthetic and symbolic value of Primitive art forms, the South Africans have since approximately the 1940's incorporated these forms into their art and so have introduced a slight, yet distinct African character to their work which may in future be sufficiently strong to distinguish South African art from its European model.

In the work of both N.P. van Wyk Louw and Alexis Preller there is a definite, apparently conscious, even determined intellectual development towards the peak expressions found in the epic poem Raka and in the painting Primavera. It would seem that both use their earlier work as a model for the later (13), and in order to appreciate fully the symbolic depiction that they have given of Africa in these works, it is necessary to trace in brief the development which led up to this culmination.

In Van Wyk Louw’s first volume Alleenspraak a large number of poems still have realism as the point of departure as was noted inopenbaar in die bundel ook as natuurdistger, maar objektiewe besinging van die natuur moet ons nie ver-wag nie." (15). This clearly implies that the fundamental character of the volume is personal-subjective - expressing an individual human emotion or state of mind which may have been inspired initially by visual impressions.

14). See above; chapter 3, pg. 64.
impressions. There is constantly and obviously a distinct inclination towards personal meditation which was noted in Dennebosse and which is again to be observed in Grense. In his first volume it is already apparent that "Louw geen stemmingsdigter is nie; dat by eder die kreatiewe ontdekker is as die sensitiefontvanklike." (16). This is important because this characteristic - this creative discovery in his work - becomes all the more obvious, more powerful and more complete in his subsequent poetry. This attains a peak in Ruka in a symbolic expression of a land and people, which, although essentially African, is free from time and place and has a significant universality.

There appears to be a struggle in his early work to be released from the local, earth-bound expression which is common to all. The struggle is expressed impetuously, almost frantically as in Skreeu (17).
One is, however, aware of a haughty, isolated attitude,, of a self-assurance which is typical of the attitude of this group of poets. In this poem one senses the lonely, misunderstood prophet of the people. But simultaneously there appears to be an uncertainty and consequently there is a searching - a surrealist seeking? - for that which is hidden from common view:

Ek het dieerde nie gesien, haar lieflikheid het ek verbeur wet sturend op die yle vlug van bewaard en kleur met oor wat blind-glaagie was en wyd van vrees en waan, wou ek sien wat geen mens mag sien,
en wat geen mens hoorjies; verstaan:

It seems to be a land of the intellect and spirit which the poet of the twentieth century seeks (18). Eventually Van Wyk Louw creates a strange, dream-like (surrealist) atmosphere in Gesreuk van die dooie uie where the "landscape" is space, where there is no boundary, no time, no tangible object, no relationship to worldly actuality.

Die Hulwe Kring. Van Wyk Louw's second volume, illustrates a logical development of Alieenspraak. He himself realises that he has reached a greater maturity and that youth is past. This is apparent in Ondrag. The work is more concise, shows greater clarity and more certainty and self-assurance. There is less frantic searching, but rather a confident search (19). "In steeds sterker mate voel hy hom by magte om elke emosie onder woorde te bring, om sodoende die vormlose tot tydloosheid te verhef." (20). Therefore one finds a less excitable expression; it is more sober, more calm than some of the passionate poems of the previous volume, e.g. Herfsnamiddag (21). Vier Gebede by Jaargetye in die Boland (22) are other examples of symbolic landscape expression found in this volume. Antonissen sees these poems as the climax of the poet's development in youth, and they appear to close the half-circle.

"Die Skoonheid, die 'beeld- en naamlose' selfverwen­liking van G1, voltoo die 'hulwe kring' van sy vitaliste, autonome-lewensdriftige jeug, ontsluit vir hom iets van die ein van lewe en dood, en begin eindelik die misterie van die ewige spanning tussen ontluistering en oproep vir hom te openbaar. Die 'Vier Gebede by Jaargetye in die Boland', 'n apothoese van (....) senette, getuig van die vreugdevolle wete: hoe alles op hierdie aarde sy vervulling kry, hoe alles oorspronklik tot volheid groei in die kringloop van lewe en dood, albei goed en skoon. In hierdie (voorlopige) versameling van teenstrydighede vind die agter se jeug 'n bekroning (23).

This volume, although it is not so essentially an expression of Africa as Raka, is important because:

"In Die Hulwe Kring, groot skoonheid in ewigigheid van gees en vorm, gebore uit 'n diepe siel waarin 'n rykdom van vermoëne tot waadom gekom het, en geadel deur 'n strainge poëtiese selftuig en onvoorwaardelike gehoorwaardheid aan enkel-die-hoogheiligte, het die Boere-taal gegroeër tot 'n koninklike instrument, geas soc vertolkings van subtiliteit, fluitering en himmiëre vervoering, van krag en tederheid, van drif en beaming, van soberate plastiek en geweldige visie, en nou en dan tot verkondiging van 'n boodskap wat dra oor die grense van tyd en plek." (24).

"Met Raka het die eerste groot-opgesette en volwaardige opros in Afrikaans verskyf" (25) and it is of great importance that Kok and Raka as well as the setting in which they move are symbolic of the African landscape with all its variety, contests and conflicts.

Raka is a logical development from Van Wyk Louw's previous work, but also an "oorgang tot 'n nuwe fase. Die psigologies inhoud bly essensieel dieselfde, sy profetie en die gevolglike tank, wat hom ople om die meesterskap te beveg tot die onderbewuste bronne van ons 'eintlike mensalikheid', tot die primêre kieie waaruit die lewensorganisme evolueer tot die Synagronde self. En in ooreenstemming daarmee word ook bepaalde vormaapte van sy poëzie meer gerele- veer." (26).

Raka is an epic in five parts. It opens with a description of a typical African scene, yet concentrating in particular on the human element in the landscape (27). In vision these lines are similar to descriptions by Francis Brett Young in The City of Gold, to the painting of Irma Stern, and to the ballade Mabulôl by Eugene Marais. There are other passages which give similar pastoral visual pictures (28). But the pastoral which is uppermost in Young's passage (29) and Marais' tale is obliterated in Raka by the immediate suggestion of a mysterious, ominous presence which is far more powerful and effective than the simple warning given in a ballade. "Die vroue het hom die eerste gewuar" which later presented more fully:

Raka, die rampens, by wat nie kan dink, wat swart en donker is, van gebe en spier in lenige boog, en enkelië dier.
(pg 9.)

In previous work Van Wyk Louw had presented the conflict between good and evil; between the spiritual and the animal. In Raka this philosophy is the main impetus and is expounded to the full in symbolic terms. Raka is - as is apparent from the lines quoted - the ignoble beast personifying evil which will destroy anything that is in beautiful, complete and functional, and its aim is utter chaos. This strange foreign creature - "Hy was geen boorling van dié ruim gebied / van oorwoud en groot riviere" - has, however, a strange, powerful and dangerous fascination. It has a hypnotic power over almost everybody it meets. There is only one who recognises the danger and who realises that Raka must be exterminated if his tribe is to survive: Koki. He is depicted as an inspired leader, but also as somebody who stands slightly apart from the main group (pg 13). He even appears to be a holy man for he does not fear to swim in "'n heilige poel, waarvan sy stem / sku weggesluip het in die klam / vertroude bosse." (pg 13).

Koki is the antithesis to Raka. He is the symbol of the good and the spiritual which will make a complete sacrifice to combat an overpowering evil.

When Koki meets Raka for the first time the contrast between the two figures is clearly felt. Koki upright, proud and confident; Raka besmirched with the blood of animals which he has needlessly slaughtered, swift, but cringing, cowardly, curry favour when it is conscious of a greater power, sly, for it attempts to attack when the more noble character is unprepared.

Koki attempts to win support from his tribe against Raka in a ceremonial dance, but Raka's power is too great, the fascination too strong, and finally Koki dances the lonely dance of death.

The poem reaches a powerful, extremely tense climax when, after a search through a varied, but essentially African landscape, Koki meets Raka a second time (30). This time Raka does not cringe, but offers a horrible, beastial challenge. A pause follows. When the tale is resumed the tension has disappeared. A badly wounded, infuriated Raka is near to the kraal where the inhabitants are panic-stricken, but passive. Men set out to search for Koki and they find him in die verskeurde paphuil en die poel waar hy, hal in die modder getrap, op die skag, van sy atukkende spies gela "t, "..." (pg 29).

An /

An old woman keeps watch over Koki's body and sings a song of his life, character and leadership. But the drunken, fickle, unthinking herd celebrates Raka's victory. At that moment the infuriated Raka storms into the kraal utterly destroying the strongest and creating complete confusion and chaos in the little community. And, fearful and subdued, the tribe admits Raka's destructive rule.

When Koki and Raka are compared and contrasted, the poet introduces a subtle change in style. This is very well illustrated in the passages where the pools where each goes to drink and bathe, are described. It is interesting too, that the poet was able to express the two main characters which are symbolic of a great universal strife through the medium of an expression of the African landscape. In the passage where Koki's pool is described the sounds are clear, open and pure. Therefore the rhythm is easily flowing and it suggests elegance of movement. The image of the pool itself symbolises profundity by its bottomless depth. There is a suggestion of purity and uprightness as well as depth: "skadulooos, maar kool / van die diepte" which also is an implication of Koki's character. The pool is like a holy shrine for it is practically unapproachable and it is the abode of spirits which sometimes disturb the smooth, serene waters. The holy pool is unpolluted and clear. When Koki - "die verwarte enkeling" - swims, he experiences a sense of elevation and exaltation. - "verlcore / in die g哺乳lant van lug en wolk." There is even a suggestion of a close association with the spirit world where the reader is told of Koki's dive into the black vortex and his subsequent thrill of joy.

Raka's pool, on the other hand, is a centre of decay. This is suggested mainly by the dragging tempo, the heavy, cumbersome sounds. The images create a picture of a hot, sultry, sluggish, disease-ridden jungle marshland. Raka is by no means an associate of the spirits, but he is essentially an animal which has no sense of purity. He is filthy, clumsy, uncouth.

One frequently finds magnificent landscape descriptions throughout Raka. But one can never exactly determine where the action takes place. It has been ascertained that the poem found form after the poet had read a book about the Congo. But although the jungle descriptions may indicate Central Africa a great number of other aspects of the country are included and set alongside one another so creating a complex image of Africa as a whole. For example, the jungle and cultivated fields are side by side. After suggestions of the forest this image follows:

In die silwer oggend toe die wêreld nog koel en windorrig was en net die kraal reeds 'n poel van warm son, het Kôk uitgegaan; ver oppie lande het hy die vroue sien staan soom kranie in die groen, waartussen blink die nag se waters. (pg 10).

There is a river of the open spaces where one finds "stekerige gras" and "seekoegate" (pg 5) and where the "goudblom-mimosas" (pg 11) grows, as opposed to the sluggish jungle river where no sunlight can penetrate (pg 14). The thickest jungle appears to be in walking distance from the open grasslands, and it even appears to fringe on the desert (32). Animals from entirely different parts of the country are brought together in one great, boundary-less setting (33). The poet adds greater force to the images by their striking accuracy. He will focus sharply on various aspects, giving them a remarkable intensity and richness of colour:

toe die blou visvanger stili was na sy jag oor die gladde, warm seekoegate, en klein gelsmaap het aan 'n takkie nor die water. (pg 7).

Part four is almost entirely a vast, luxuriant, colourful and exciting depiction of landscape. In this section particularly Van Wyk Louw appears to gather the entire Africa together and re-presents it in one magnificent whole. In it one finds Raka's torpid, stagnant pool, colourful insects, exotic flowers, fruits, animals of the jungle - "'n vaal pie" - and the plains - "die eland en die giraf en die wildooses" - the lakes, the oppressive damp forest, the sky with its afternoon clouds, the jungle itself (34). Finally a magnificent general picture is given which incorporates it all (35). The reader cannot recognise the people in the poem as belonging specifically to any one particular tribe. They are symbolic of all the people of Africa - including, the reader feels, the White Man. Raka cannot be recognised as a particular kind of animal. Although superficially he may look like a splendid giant ape, he is also half human. This strange, eerie creature stands for the bestial, the darkness, the chaotic, the destructive power which is inherent in all communities. "Die simboliek het hier met die inhoud en vorm van die gedig saamgroeí en bevat 'n dringende boodskap aan die moderne wêreld wat dreig om in chaos onder te gaan." (36).

Alexis Preller has created a symbol of Africa too. Maybe not so imbued with pessimism as Van Wyk Louw's symbol, but nevertheless Preller's figure in Primavera (fig. 31) belongs to no race nor tribe, nor is she bound by time or place. Like Koki and Raka she can wander in any part of Africa and she may be regarded as expressive of Africa as a whole.

"Preller has always been interested in painting Africans. Pre-war trips to Swaziland and the Congo provided the material for some of his best early work." (37). His Swaziland paintings are simple in design and expression, although even in these the onlooker is aware of a tense, nervous feeling which pervades the early works and which will develop in the later work. In the Congo he made a discovery which was important because it is indicative of the surrealist inclination which is to characterise Preller's subsequent work. Preller wrote: "Whatever I am after is contained by an African shape" (38) and in the Congo he found that shape which, for a certain length of time, could "contain his mood."

Christi Truter writes the following: "When he returned from the Congo, he did not arrive with a bundle of native types and exotic figures. His main treasure which he presented, baffling us, was a completely insignificant little sketch of a distorted head. This he called an 'Urnhed.' He had found the basic shape in the children's shaven..."

shaven heads distorted from birth. To him, this form had a purity and was the ideal vehicle into which for many years later he was to pour his mood. In his painting 'Remembrance of things past', four years later, he used the same form to hold the flowers of his nostalgia. Until then, he had said that this form could contain not only his mood, but would accommodate the mood of anyone else in genuine reaction to the painting. But three years later his outlook had veered, and it was he, himself who decided to find out what this obsessing form contained. In the painting 'The Grotto', he opens the head and finds a quiet pool with glowing flowers floating on the surface." (39).

The paintings of the urn head illustrate Freller's and the contemporary poets' - seeking for hidden concepts. It appears that if the painter is to find what he seeks he must break an existing form to find the more perfect revelation - possibly self-revelation - within.

It is significant that Freller's first picture of the Ndebele was painted in 1935 (40) and it is among his earliest works (41). So, although the painter's final symbol of Africa was produced fifteen years after the publication of Raka, his early work does correlate in time with the work of the poets in his group. It appears to be a usual phenomenon that the literature of this country has always gained maturity before the painting. In general literature had achieved a considerable standard before painting on the whole - excluding a few notable exceptions - had even begun to free itself from an exhausted romantic impressionism. And in the case of individuals such as C.K. van den Heever and Pierneef, and N.F. van Wyk Louw and Alexis Freller the poet appears to have developed more rapidly than the painter.

Although there were doubtless other influences responsible for Primavera, this painting can be regarded as a direct development from the paintings of the Ndebele. Merwe Scholtz notes that Freller constantly works from a previous picture; in other words, he uses a previous painting as a model (42). Freller himself states / states that "he often begins with an idea" (43) and then goes on to explain that the idea may disappear in the course of the painting:

"Students might require to know what those ideas were. It will be difficult to know, because somewhere along the way to expression, the idea became transmuted - the tangible and concrete result in no way resembling or expressing that initial impulse, the idea.

That is something to grasp, something to understand - when an idea is taken along under the impulse of paint and brushes, important things happen to it. If any magic has worked under the nervous tension of the hand impelling the brush, so many accidental things have occurred, so many quick, almost automatic flashes have built a fire which possesses its own radiation, that the transmuted idea lives because of itself, whether or not it resembles its genesis - and not because it lives in the brain of the originator.

When his brushes are against the canvas and colour selected, the idea, being the germ of all this incentive to seek in painting, is tucked somewhere behind his eyes, held no longer in such solemn respect, because it is recognized what ability it possesses to change itself with innumerable disguises, to emerge eventually quite different from its original state.

But let me admit its function. - It is the germ form from which he starts."

This statement accounts for the constant, steady development in his work as opposed to the erratic development which is found in the work of some painters.

The Ndebele theme appears to be uppermost in the work of 1950 onwards. The Kraal of 1952 is a significant painting in the subsequent development of the symbolic African figure. The Kraal is a comparatively unambiguous painting in which figures, objects (the water jar, the wall) and patterns are repeated which had been seen before in many paintings. But almost immediately afterwards, maybe even simultaneously, the figures reveal a strange, mysterious change, once again illustrating the seeking and the surrealist inclination of the painter. In The Pyramid one of the figures in the Kraal is painted alone. Her heavy, cumbersome shape is somewhat related to the shape of a pyramid - hence its name (44).

43). Christi Truter: Op. cit. In the second essay in this book, Alexia Freller writes about himself, but refers to an artist whom he knows rather well; whose name is his name.

44). The title was explained by the painter when he showed the painting in 1953.
The important characteristic of this work is that the figure appears to reveal an intense, glowing inner life. This is achieved mainly by the luminous, yet eerie colour which seems to radiate from the little figure. The Vibrating Figure is based on the same model, but now there seems to be an attempt to break the existing actual shell. The figure is painted repeatedly, overlapping itself and the lines of the one flow into the lines of the other. The general design is still based on the limp pyramidal form of the previous picture, but the figure gains in stature and dignity. The colour in this case vibrates too because it is applied in the "broken" manner. Fine strokes of subtle colour are laid thinly over a varied underpainting which gives a remarkable luminosity to the entire composition. Frel's now appears to discard this particular model temporarily and he now concentrates on the figure in the kraal which is seen from front view. The Red Figure (fig. 29) - painted several years after the kraal - reveals how the little Mapogga figure is breaking and is losing her tribal identity, but she still maintains the dignity which was revealed in the stately painting The Last of the Mapogga. The title of this painting is significant. It seems to imply that a stage in the painter's career is over, and that in future he will be able to proceed beyond the boundaries of any particular tribe if he wishes to do so. At this time (approx. 1955 - 6) Frel's work underwent a great change as a result of a visit to Egypt and as a result of a government commission for three murals (45) which demanded work on a far larger scale than the painter had been accustomed to before. The Red Figure is an example of work done in this new phase, and although it is based upon an old model the expression has gained considerably in power. In the Red Figure the human shell is disintegrating and purely pictorial forms are beginning to appear. Now, in other pictures, an entirely new figure is introduced. It is a strange abstraction of the human figure, but with her distorted length and tenuity and the rather disturbing "hammer head" she is typical of the twentieth century symbol of the human figure. She carries / carries a very decorative musical instrument - at first bearing resemblance to a lyre - but later looking more like an astrolabe, and as such it was labeled by the painter. This figure is usually accompanied by other figures, and although one can hardly and should not make poetic-philosophic implications when looking at a painting, the figures which are introduced in these compositions could be interpreted as the figure of the city, the figure of the land who are joined by the figure of the country as a whole. In Hieratic Women (fig. 30) and Women in the Night these three figures appear. The blanketed figure suggesting the city with its tall buildings; the next figure suggesting the primitive with its love for colourful, linear pattern; and the third figure being the symbol of the complexity and mystery of Africa. It may be a far fetched interpretation, but Freller's work will almost inevitably challenge the onlooker to interpret verbally.

In Primavera (fig. 31) the now familiar figure has become a complete symbol of the African landscape and the African people. Van Wyk Louw wrote a verse about seventeen years before Primavera's appearance which accurately describes the sensation she leaves with the onlooker:

Ek sal van hierdie reis nêe keer en julle ken, want geel en stil riviere, vreemde kongo's en ocrowoed wat wit draderig tril deur giftige mis, net ek gekruis ni boie skote, en tussoon my en julle lê jagvur en volke en my swaar dink en smart geas.

(verses 3 and 4:
Die Hart op die Pees.
Gestalte en Diere.)

Indeed she has travelled a long way and she will continue to wander for she belongs to no one "jagvuur" of any particular tribe, but she stands apart as representative of them all.

In the painting one sees the complex, highly decorative figure standing apart from the other. Within her one sees elements of the landscape: grass, leaves and berries are held in her hands, and within her own design there are the symbols of rivers, mountains.
mountains, plants and stars in the curved tenuous lines and exotic pattern found in the robes and additional decoration. Separating her from another African figure is a powerful, narrow, rectangular abstract pattern which may be interpreted as "stil riviere, vreemde kongo's en oorwoude" for the linear, elaborate design is strongly suggestive of tall trees, deep chasms and the somber, cool colour of the misty dampness of the jungle forest. Within the other elegant, slightly curved "primitive sculpture" figure the design is again suggestive of the African landscape. In it is introduced a decorative symbol of the African animals.

Although it is on a deep emotional level which defies conscious definition that one feels most strongly the similarity of the work of Preller and Van Wyk Louw, there are in addition more easily demonstrable points of contact.

Besides being able to apply the term "creative discoverer" to both artists, the following points made by Opperman in connection with Raka can be used to evaluate Preller's work too.

The final conception of Raka found its form in the Congo, although Van Wyk Louw's experience of the Congo was indirect. As has been noted Preller made valuable "discoveries" in the Congo which have found expression in his work. This seems to be particularly clear in Primavera, although the influence of other parts of the country is apparent in the accompanying paintings (46). In a similar manner the poet expresses other parts of the country together with the Congo expression.

Raka must necessarily break and destroy. Preller - led by surrealism - must break his figures, but here the implication the painter wishes to make is different to that made by the poet. The painter attempts to find the essential, living form within an outer shell or mask. The poet wishes to emphasize the destructive, mutilating power of evil. The painter's breaking builds up and sets free; the poet's breaking damages and kills, setting free not a perfect form or revelation / revelation, but evil. This characteristic indicates the different characters of the two artists, and which is probably responsible for the greatest difference in their work. Van Wyk Louw has a distinct sense of tragedy and that probably caused him to find expression through poetry. In Preller's work there is a sense of optimism and a love of colour which made "painting his language." (47).

Van Wyk Louw creates new, original, personal images; Preller does the same. The new contribution made by Van Wyk Louw was "die abstrakte wat so konkretn voorgesteel word" (48). This is characteristic of Preller's work, for the abstract in his paintings presumes a startling emphatic reality.

Opperman says that it is particularly in the detail that one can see "hoe 'n groot onfyn meester Van Wyk Louw is." (49). In Preller's work the detail is of the greatest importance. If one pattern - however small - is removed from his painting the entire composition will suffer. It is perhaps in his detail that Preller manages to convey that strange, intense, mysterious quality that pervades his pictures.

Frequently the two artists use the same aspects of the African theme:

The kraal, a favourite subject with Preller, is an important nucleus in the lives of the people in Baka. Preller has painted a number of ceremonial bulls and dances to the bull. Incidentally, the figure so symbolic of Africa in Primavera sometimes makes her mysterious appearance at these rituals. One likes to believe that she watched while hoki danced to the red bull. Preller has painted the African spirits - e.g. Kima. Van Wyk Louw suggests the African spirits too when he speaks of their holy pool. Preller paints the exotic fire bird in all its extravagant plumes and glowing colour; Van Wyk Louw sees "'n klein ator wat vul," which is "die flits van 'n rooi papegaai."

The /

The pattern Preller creates in his work is - as has been noted - always significant and intense. Note how the stars in Woman in the Night seem to glow in their dark setting, and then note how vitally important the star-shaped flowers are in the following lines:

en dan ston, begriploos gestaar na 'n treo wit en suur waablomme, groot soos hande en puur ster-vormig teen die donker glim van die verse liane wat hier klim aan die voorste bome -

The flowers appear to have a hypnotic power over Raka. Van Wyk Louw's sun which fills horizon to horizon with white fire can be seen in many of Preller's more surrealist works, e.g. the Shell, the Duchess of Amalfi, the murals of the Receiver of Revenue Building, but also in the Woman with a Lyre where the landscape appears to be flattened and scourged by the overwhelming white light. The "bloo gange" of the tropical woods mentioned by the poet appear to recur in the centre piece of Primavera, particularly in colour and in the tall, "deep" design.

Although one may choose to consider Raka and Primavera as the present peak of the artists' contributions, their work and development has by no means ended. And in their subsequent works one can again trace similarities in the fundamental expression. A year after the publication of Raka Van Wyk Louw produced Gestaltes en Diere - a volume of separate poems. Although these poems do not form an African epic, the fundamental emotion is the same as that found in Raka. Some of the poems were written at the same time as Raka, others before. Die Strandjutwulf illustrates the poet's obsession of the spiritual conflict which found concrete expression in Raka. The expression in Gestaltes en Diere may in some instances even be more powerful, more cynical and more embittered than in Raka, e.g. Die Hond van God.

Preller's Three Figures (fig. 32) is a logical development of Primavera and the accompanying paintings. The same hieratic, decorative, symbolic figure... is there, but now her companions have assumed the same shapes, and they are indoors. So, as in Gestalten en Dierc, the same theme is repeated, but in a more complicated form, which, however, is more fragmentary and it has lost some of its concentration and impetus.

One can also mention Nuwe Versae (1954), Van Wyk Louw’s latest volume in which he concentrates on metaphysical expression (50). In Klipwerk he appears to break reality into tiny splinters which each has its own glowing intensity, but it appears, superficially, to be unrelated to its neighbours. Maybe the comparison is again a personal reaction, but Preller’s painting of the Grand Canal, Venice and a composition to which he wishes to give no title can be seen a parallels to Klipwerk. Preller even terms the little units in the composition with no title as "chips" forming a very complex but interesting unity in their grouping. "Chips" and "Klipwerk" seem to indicate that both artists were striving towards similar conclusion.

The tiny patterns in the paintings are intense, important, imbued with individual life, and yet they are bound by a larger, more universal shape. The little splinters of "rock" in Klipwerk are struck from one big parent rock, and the splinters’ identity cannot be denied.

Asterion - the libretto for an Afrikaans opera by Van Wyk Louw (51) - and in the pictures exhibited at Preller’s latest exhibition (52) both artists appear to revert to old models and develop a familiar theme. In Asterion a philosophy similar to that in Raka is expounded, yet now the evil which was born and set free as a result of a community’s boredom, can be and is, obliterated.

Models which had contributed to the final form which Preller’s symbolic figure would take in Primvera - such such as the girls in the Kruel, the Vibrating Figure, and the Pyramid - are seen again in practically their original shapes, while the symbolic figure itself still features in several paintings. One composition in particular is of interest, viz: the Tower. In this Freller appears to have gathered the various African tribes which had inspired him to paint together in one decorative column, but rising out above them all is the symbolic "hammer head" of the Primavera-figure.

Whereas it is possibly Pierneef and C.M. van den Hoever who give us the most typical visual experience of South Africa, it is Van Wyk Louw and Freller - and other members of their group - who have given South African art a greater universality, a greater depth, a greater technical competence and a more advanced form of expression, enabling it to make a contribution outside the borders of this country.
CONCLUSION:

Upon reconsidering the fifty years of true art expression in South Africa it becomes clear that there has been a rapid development from an exhausted romantic realism through impressionism to the decorative and semi-symbolic or semi-realistic, to culminate in a symbolic expression which is in many instances similar, and may in some cases be equal in quality, to contemporary art in Europe, maintaining, however, a distinct South African character.

In the various periods - enumerated in the first chapter - in the development of South African art certain figures stand out in bold relief, and may later come to be considered as important contributors to the continuity of art in this country. Among the realists and impressionists - which may be considered as one group because realism in the twentieth century is largely coloured by impressionism - Pieter Wenning and Hugo Naudé stand out as the leading painters, and they would undoubtedly have been accompanied by Clement Seneque and Harry Stratford Caldecott had they been able to produce more work. In standard the painting of the last two artists stands on an equal plane to that of Wenning and certainly to that of Naudé. C. Louis Leipoldt can be considered as the leading poet of this group, although Jan F.E. Colmers and Totius as well as Eugene Marais are of great importance in the history of Afrikaans poetry, mainly because they were so instrumental in establishing the Afrikaans language. The realist writers who also did valuable work in giving Afrikaans a status as a language are D.F. Malherbe and Sangiro.

All these artists not only initiated a serious South African art, but revealed that characteristic which is typical of the average South African, viz: a love and interest of their countryside. In their early work it is already quite apparent that the landscape holds a peculiar fascination for the people.

The artists of the second group are still bound to a large extent to the landscape theme. These people, however, now introduce a distinct twentieth century / century mode of expression which was lacking in the work of their predecessors who were working in the style of the nineteenth century. They also find a more essentially African truth which they express through their painting and writing. In other words: the European influence which was uppermost in the work of the realists, is receding in the work of this group, and, in fact, it is difficult to appreciate their work fully if one is not acquainted with their subject matter. Again a number of artists stand out, and they were considered the leading artists of the country for a long time. Pierneef and C.M. van den Hoever must be considered in particular in this group. They can probably be considered the first to give an absolutely indigenous expression of and for their people. Other painters of this group who have made valuable contributions - particularly because they introduced a contemporary trend - are Maggie Laubser and Irma Stern. Roy Campbell is an important poet in this group, for he revealed unusual aspects of familiar subjects, and he gave great impetus to a somewhat timid English-South African literature. In one instance (in Op Ver Eerste) P.J. Schoeman gave a refreshing additional quality to a hunting tale which could be developed in Afrikaans prose writing.

Among the "Symbolists" who placed South African art in a position to compare with contemporary art in Europe, Cecil Higgins, Walter Battiss and Alexis Freller are the important painters. N.P. van Wyk Louw is the leading poet of the "Thirties", who is followed in importance by D.J. Opperman. These artists have undoubtedly contributed the most valuable work, and it is largely through their endeavour that South African art became known beyond its borders.

Although the various artists have been grouped together in time and style, it is particularly noticeable when reviewing art in this country, that in most cases the development in literature precedes that of painting. E.g. Pierneef's development was much slower than that of his parallel, C.M. van den Hoever who is a generation younger. And yet, as has been noted, the work of these two artists is remarkably similar and in many cases produced at exactly the same time. The significant painting of Alexis Freller and Walter Battiss was produced / produced in the late forties and their most important work has been done in the fifties, whereas their contemporaries had published their best poetry in the thirties. There are possible reasons for this. There was an antagonism against Afrikaans as a language which challenged and compelled Afrikaners to write in order to prove a right of existence of Afrikaans. (It is noticeable that where there was no dangerous antagonism against English, literature by the English-speaking South Africans was slow to develop.) The small Afrikaner reading community was eager to receive work in their own spoken language which was a strong incentive for the Afrikaners to write. They were confident that their work would be appreciated.

Secondly the Afrikaners were moved as they had never been moved before in their short history by the South African War. Consequently their poets expressed sincere, deep emotions which were the emotions of the people too, and as a result poetry became more widely read and poets were encouraged to write more. Painting does not express the emotions of the people in quite the same way. It may not express a general emotion so directly, for the pictorial sensation must be converted into words for many members of the community before they will accept it as valuable for themselves. The few individual paintings which might have been made at the time could not reach the people in such great numbers as the poems, and they could not be carried about, whereas everyone could learn and recite the poems.

Contact with other literature - e.g. the Dutch, Flemish, German, English - and later French and Spanish was relatively simple. One could therefore learn from contemporary literature, and set a critical standard. But there was very little direct contact with European painting. Therefore there was no incentive to achieve a world standard in this form of art. It was only after the Second World War that direct contact with European art became more general, and it made both painters and public demand a higher standard. In addition, as a result of the direct European influence, the South African last discovered the aesthetic value, apart from the picturesque and exotic value, of their country's primitive and his art. This invigorating influence they incorporated into their own art expression.

At present it would appear that painting is making the greater contribution to art in general. The work of Walter Battiss and Alexis Preller maintains a high standard - although possibly not achieving the same heights as before - whereas the work of the contemporary poets has certainly not surpassed the peak achieved by Van Wyk Louw in Haka and by Opperman in Journal van Jorik. Prose writing is at present at a very low level.

As been noted above, the African landscape has usually been the South African's subject matter. It has had a remarkable influence upon the people, and this influence seems to be stronger here than in other countries. The probable reason for this is that the very small population in a vast and varied country has only recently introduced a true urban aspect to its way of life. The rural has always - until very recently - been primary in this country, whereas in European countries with an urban tradition the rural is relatively small and unknown. All South Africans, however, are in close contact with nature, and they find it natural to express their emotions through their surroundings. In the pioneering days it was curiosity and interest which was expressed in simple naive recordings of the scene. Later a lyrical quality was introduced through romantic realism and impressionism, presenting the most ign which was such a familiar characteristic of the South African expression of the first century to thirty years of this century. This nostalgia may also reflect the South African's uncertainty when he realised that the inevitable urbanisation must take place - however small and insignificant this urbanisation may appear alongside the European.

The new city dweller is still influenced by the landscape - for although he is urbanised, the city's impact is yet too small and insignificant within the setting of a vast and overpowering landscape. The city is as yet too small to overcome the power and fascination of the endless and ruthless veld, desert and mountains. The city dweller, therefore, when giving form to his experiences, often makes use of veld symbols - flora, fauna, the elements governing the veld, primitive symbols imbued with a new meaning. Most of these symbols have this one unifying characteristic: they originate in the open country.

Yet to the onlooker and the reader these symbols are not merely an expression of the artists' experiences and emotions. They are not merely a possible expression of his own sensations. These symbols are expressive of Africa as a whole. The "symbolists" appear to have discovered that Africa is too vast, too varied and too harsh to express in unambiguous, descriptive terms. The romantic realists and the impressionists gave only one aspect of Africa - and that seen through "foreign" eyes. They described the enchanting, the delicate, the softly melancholy Africa. It is always necessarily one locality - one scene - which can be presented, therefore limiting the experience to a very large extent.

The semi-realistists, the expressionists and the decorative painters appeared to recognize the limitations of the work done by the previous group of artists, and they attempted to give a more universal expression. They abandoned the charming and delicate aspect of the country; the lyrical beauty is replaced by a more flamboyant and severe beauty. There is a sense of tragedy (only vaguely sensed in the work of the realist-impressionist poets and practically absent in the painting), inevitability and harshness in this work. With the exception of the painting by Maggie Laubsler and Irma Stern who used South African subject matter in a European idiom, the literature and painting of this period has more of the essential African character - a primitive freshness and daring, a wild spontaneity, a somewhat haughty quality. This work is less foreign, but still bound to a locality, although that locality has a bigger African range than the impressions. Therefore the range for appreciation is still limited. In other words, one must know South Africa - the "bone structure" of Africa, one must have actually experienced it directly if one is to appreciate fully the work of Pierneef or C.K. van den Heever. But once one has experienced South Africa then Pierneef's and Van den Heever's contributions are more valuable than that of their predecessors because basically they are closer to the African truth than the earlier work. It is clearly defined, less equivocal and ephemeral. It expresses its hardness, its relentlessness, its fanaticism, its largeness, but it also indicates in short intermediate passages, in colour, in occasional accents the charm, the delicacy and the loveableness of the land. The limitation of the work is - as noted above - its bounded locality. Although it may be a very adequate and true expression of Africa, it lacks a greater universality and will probably find few admirers outside its borders.

The "symbolists" at last realised that the emotion evoked by their country could not be expressed fully by descriptive means. They no longer make any attempt to depict the scenery and the customs (to a large extent influenced and formed by the environment) of their country and people with visual accuracy for their more universal aim cannot be achieved by such means. They attempt to recreate the individuality of the entire problem which is South Africa. They attempt to incorporate both the landscape and the varied elements found in it into a symbol (or symbols) for their emotional attitude to Africa - an attitude which is reflected by such terms as colourful, harsh, flamboyant, enigmatic, haughty, primitive, savage, etc. which have been used to describe the land. It has become clear through the contribution made by the poets and painters of "Dertig" that Africa can best be depicted through symbols - even though they have very probably found their origin in visual reality - if its complex nature is to bear any significance outside its borders. The visual representations based upon visual realism can only speak to those who have seen and who have a memory image of a similar scene or event.

When South African art is seen as a whole, it becomes quite clear that painting and literature form a complete expression of Africa which must be seen as one unit made up of different elements and going through various stages of development. Although the rate of development has not been directly consistent or parallel in the various art forms, the pattern is nevertheless coherent, and when seen as a whole and in general it forms a perfect and logical unity.
Appendix I

The farm labourer and animal:

Although, when considering the farm labourer and animal, one leaves the field of landscape depiction, and an entirely new problem is created, both the labourer and the animal form a distinct part of their environment and give it character and colour. In addition, some of the most interesting and valuable work has been inspired by this subject matter. It is therefore worthwhile to include reference to this work as a completion to the discussion on the depiction of landscape.

The typical white farm labourer and his native assistant have been depicted adequately in the work by Olive Schreiner, Jonker, Van Melle, C.M. van den Heever to name only a few. It is self-evident that the farm folk will play an important part in all novels in which the farm is used as a theme. But a few characters have left a distinct impression on South African culture. In particular the poor-white Ampie - created by Jochem van Brugge, the coloured Toiings - Mikro's (1) well-known and much loved character, and Moeder Poulin - G.H. Franz's idealised but loveable native woman. It is interesting, but nevertheless typical of South African art, that each character is a farm figure. Although Ampie and Toiings do sometimes leave the farm in search of happiness and progress in the towns, the original environment inevitably calls them back. These characters have been formed by their rural surroundings; they have become part of it.

Although Jochem van Brugge's style is inferior to that of his contemporaries - D.F. Malherbe, Sangiro, Langenhoven - his trilogy about Ampie is considered to be one of the important contributions to Afrikaans literature, because in it one finds one of the most "alive" characters in all Afrikaans prose. Another reason for its importance lies in the fact that van Bruggen introduced a new subject - that of the poor-white - which was 1).

1). Pseudonym for C.H. Kuhn. was to be exploited later by other writers.

Ample and his faithful companion - Ou-Jakob the grey donkey - are part of the drab, dusty Transvaal landscape. Ample, the offspring of an entirely degenerate household, frequently reveals the characteristics of a wild animal that will only be at ease when free. It is this wildness of the boy which is expressed in his actions and his appearance that makes him an inherent part of his environment. The reader is fully conscious of the surroundings although very little direct description of the landscape is given.

Ample is uncontrollably savage and cruel when he realises that his strength is the greater as is illustrated in the encounter at the slaughtering place, but he whimpers and cringes when a superior threatens punishment. He has no sense of rightful ownership, and anything that he may find unguarded belongs to him.

Throughout the book Van Bruggen illustrates and emphasises the naturalness of this young degenerate by episodes such as those mentioned. Van Bruggen is an extreme realist, and the figure Ample is actually based on a poor neglected child who came to work on the writer's farm. But that was the starting off point, and eventually Ample became a significant, individual character, independent of the original model.

The simple, realistic, entirely unpretentious style emphasises the simple character. There is a lack of original, striking imagery, but there is the mere recording of the most obvious surrounding elements. This again accentuates the dull-witted Ample. Throughout the writer has brought his language to the mental level of his characters and with that enlarges the simplicity.

The Ample trilogy - especially Die Natuurkind - has a charming appeal, a gentle humour - at the time of writing new in Afrikaans literature - and a sympathy and a note of hope which explains its popularity to a large extent.

The Toiinge trilogy by Mikro is similar to the Ample trilogy in its realistic conception, and its focus on the poorer members of the community. As Ample is accepted as Van Bruggen's most important work, so is Toiinge Mikro's best known and most significant contribution. Mikro will be remembered for his Toiinge.

The landscape, however, is only noted in passing - again a conformity with Afrikaans, but nevertheless Toiings, his friends and associates form an inherent part of the environment.

Immediately the style and language of the book suggest the simple, sincere character of the main figure, and the naivety is maintained throughout, so frequently introducing delightful humour, but sometimes creating a rather ridiculous "puppet theatre" atmosphere.

It is characteristic that Toiings should fundamentally love the farm and shun the locations, and it becomes obvious that life in the towns can only be derogatory - a rather unpleasant and to some extent unfounded didacticism found in many of the earlier Afrikaans prose works. On the farm Toiings wishes to cultivate a piece of land, visualising great prosperity and gain, and he carefully selects his piece of ground. The ploughing and the sowing episode and the ultimate consequences well illustrate Mikro's method of utilising the elements in the landscape as additional and temporary extras: mentioned, important for a moment and then dismissed. Yet these "flashes" enable the reader to visualise the setting. The conversations and thoughts of the characters as well as their actions more or less describe the environment.

"Skaars 'n voet hoog lê die wal draai-draai in die leegte" is practically the only description given directly by the writer of Toiing's cornland; his fantasy adds to it:

"Vir Toiings is dit sômer 'n bul van 'n wal, met sy uitloop on al." (pg. 18). Toiings watches the corn grow, and his remarks indicate its progress; the writer gives no description.

Sometimes Mikro does give a slightly longer description. In the example quoted below it is introduced by a philosophical remark foreign to the general simple character, but almost immediately the writer reverts to the artless, unsophisticated style - expressive of Toiings and his people:

Maar die Karrooewer noem 'n mans nie altyd in ag nie. Soms het die windjie die lank op was gestaan, en ge- omgekom tot hy uiteindelik oom ia. Daar het hy lank ge- stand en toe lê hy by vir hom op naard. Die eerste dag het hy in die westeke sulke lose-gertigé wolke gego- gen, die tweede dag vaster wolke en die derde dag, so- toen twee uur, lyk hulle sêetlik so blou van onder. Oors het sulke yl buitjies uitgegaan, as yl dat dit jou aan
Sometimes nature is made to react to the occasion. A device frequently used successfully by several writers. But Mikro makes the accidental too obvious and too theatrical so that it becomes rhetoric and leaves the impression of insincerity. For example, he prays, asking his dead Siena whether she agrees that he marries again. He does not wish to do it for his own sake, but he is powerless to look after their baby son. Then:

Op dieselfde oomblik trek 'n ster 'n vuurstreep deur die lug en toe weet Toiings dat Siena hom gehoor en verstaan het. (pg 40).

More successful are the numerous phrases in which the coloureds see a situation in relation to or in comparison with nature; e.g. "Lewid meet nou grootword nee 'n weesbobbejaantjie." (pg 67) and "Criet laat 'n mens van die regte speer afduwel nee 'n maer, moods-willige ou ooi in mistige weer." (pg 63). Examples such as these illustrate the coloureds close affinity to nature, and they suggest how these simple people will endeavour to explain any situation in relation to the immediate and familiar surroundings. Therefore it is not surprising that natural phenomena will lead to superstition. Although the landscape may not be noticed in many cases because the occupant is not directly concerned with it, in other cases it is seen in an over emphasised light and consequently has a strong impetus, as is illustrated in the description of the thunder storm in which Toiings is caught.

The story is realistic in its development, and poignant in its depiction of Toiinga's struggle to find peace and happiness. But the naïveté, typifying of the hero, amusing and touching to begin with, is maintained too consistently. Therefore a really deep character is not created, but rather a caricature that cannot be taken altogether seriously. However, Toiinga has become part of the South African scene, and Mikro has made a valuable contribution in introducing the coloured into Afrikaans literature in a sympathetic manner.
In Meeeder Poulin by G.H. Franz the main character is revealed in more or less the same manner as in Teiinda. Just as Mikro uses the coloureds' idiom in his endeavour to make his character as alive as possible, so Franz uses the Bantu idiom with the picturesque figures of speech, observations and comparisons throughout the story. But whereas in Teiinda the style becomes forced and eventually unconvincing, in Meeeder Poulin it maintains its charming fascination to the end, possibly because Meeeder Poulin tells the story herself. There is no background writing that will suggest an author who is forcing his language into the idiom of a less sophisticated, less educated individual as there is in Teiinda. Although the book is not without humour, there is never a suggestion of the ridiculous in Meeeder Poulin. The reader experiences a strong emotion of respect, love and understanding which is the basis of the old relationship between White Man and African. The author appears really to understand the old-time respectful and respected servant, and the most important contribution of this book is "... die selfopenbaring, tot ouer in Afrikaans die maes onmiddellijk beelding van 'n natuurlike siel." (2).

Meeeder Poulin as a member of a primitive community will not see her environment as separate from the daily life and experiences of the people. The landscape is therefore never isolated. But very frequent actions, occurrences, people are seen in close relation to nature, may even be synonymous with it, or explained by it:

Maar meesies! Daar kum die doring al komende. Dit kum nooit 'n haelsterm wet 'n mens ver af kan al. One vroue kum hierdie onweer. (pg 24 - 25.)

and:

Die goeie vrou is soos die ouderdom. (pg 42 - 43).

These are merely two examples of the many delightful and often most unusual and refreshing comparisons that the old native woman makes between people with their various emotions and reactions, and nature.

Another charming characteristic of the book is the Bantu's apparent lack of vocabulary. To remedy this, he will construct new expressions with a few descriptive words / words which he uses frequently. One often finds the phrase: "Kom kyk!" when a situation or scene defies description. In similar instances where words are inadequate to describe the situation, nature is called to the rescue:

2). antonissen: Afrskaanse letterkunde. pg 286.

Die kombuis was glad te klein, en ons het buite gekook. Dit was nie kinders nie, dit was sommer sprikane. (pg 16)

In other words, the crowd of children was like a swarm of locusts.

Sometimes a natural phenomenon needs a word; the horizon, for example, and the setting sun:

Die son daal, die son daal, net mo hy gaan sit op die rand van die kom-keer, hier kom twee vrouens aan. (pg 5).

Note how the repetition also adds to the description of the action, how it adds a certain tension which well introduces the important arrival of the two women.

In order to explain the rainbow and lightning, Moeder Poulin does not hesitate to tell a fairy tale so convincingly that her two young charges set out to find the lightning-bird’s egg. (3). The passage well illustrates the style, the landscape depiction, the imitation of sounds, the unusual description of actions found throughout the book.

The book has a fresh, unsophisticated quality, an unusual idyllic charm. Yet there is no sentimentality, and it lacks the bitter cynicism which one finds in so many contemporary works. Through its deep sincerity it is indeed "een van die topprestasies van die heersendes Afrikaanse proe." (4).

Ample and Cu-Jakob, Tuings and Mmapoulin are to be found in painting too. Allerly Glouwop has painted a little gouache depicting ragged boys and shaggy donkeys – one a grey – which forms an exceptionally good illustration to Ample. But it is no more than an illustration, and therefore one cannot really speak of a parallel because the book is far more powerful than the painting.

Cu Klaas /

3). Appendix 2. no. 65.
_Ou klaas_ by Hugo Naudé is a sensitive, yet strong painting in which the observer may wish to see Toilings. But Naudé has treated his subject more seriously than Mikro. Naudé has depicted a strong personality which cannot possibly be as naive and simple hearted as Toilings. The character depicted in the painting has a noble, slightly aloof attitude which is absent in the book, and which give the painting a certain impressiveness.

In the book one meets Oompi Dissel who has an important influence on Toilings. He is a lovable character, but described in the humorous-mocking manner that Mikro makes use of constantly. This old man is definitely to be found in Gregoire Boonzaier's _Hottentot_. It would appear that the painter - like the writer - was rather amused by the simple old Hottentot who takes himself so seriously. The painting is somewhat caricature - again similar to the book. In the picture the worthy little old man is seated, very erect and full of "dignity", hands on a crooked stick which is planted firmly before him. The entire picture is controlled by a severe yet freakish pattern, suggesting the stiffness of the old man. Harmonious, low-tone colour unifies the entire composition. But although Boonzaier's picture may be a more immediate parallel to Mikro's character, it is more illustrative than Naudé's picture of _Ou klaas_ and therefore sooner forgotten. From an artistic point of view the parallel is therefore to be found in _Ou klaas_ and Toilings because both make a lasting impact, even though their characters may differ. Of these two _Ou klaas_ is possibly the greater work of art because in its expression and execution it is more universal, but unfortunately the painting - which is in a private collection - is not as well known as the book.

Maggie Laubser's _Old woman_ (5) and Mmapoulin are certainly the most striking parallels in this group. Maggie Laubser has painted the old, concerned, loving character whom the reader visualises when reading Frans's work. Possibly Maggie Laubser's woman is more serious, more weighed down by life's burdens than the old mother in the story, but the deep sensitivity of which the reader is so strongly aware in the book is to be found in the the painting too. The fundamental difference in the two works is to be found in the different characters of the two artists: Franz, the idyllic realist who will nevertheless allow fantasy - inspired by Bantu lore - to enter his work; and Maggie Laubser, the expressionist who will endeavour to depict human emotions and the deepest experience in the most intense and most direct manner.

In painting the farm labourer has possibly been expressed most sympathetically by Maggie Laubser. In all her work one finds a child-like innocent love for the simple folk. This characteristic is in another similarity which relates the painter's work so closely to Moeder Foulin. Many of Maggie Laubser's pictures can be placed alongside poems and prose passages and show remarkable resemblances, e.g. The Old Bushman (6) with the feather in his hat and his weather beaten face may be D.F. Malherbe's Jakob Ontong. The Hardboy (7) could be W.E.G. Louw's Ou-Plantsarkie. Many pictures of Harvesters have their parallel not only in C.K. van den Heever's Sonja and D.F. Malherbe's Die Meulens, but also in G... Watermeyer's oes Myry and Lusernary (Skel en Simbual.)

Maggie Laubser's work gives more than the mere visual reality, and that may possibly be an explanation for the many similarities with literature. Maggie Laubser will always attempt to express the deeper qualities of her subject. That may be the reason why she seldom works direct from the model, but from a memory image. The visual model can only give her the superficial, whereas she wishes to give the inner personality.

"As ek van 'n model af skilder, bederf dit byna altyd die skildery. Ek kan alleen 'n model gebruik wanneer die skildery reeds klaar is; die model suggereer dan soms iets nuttig aan my." (8).

Maggie Laubser's work bears a resemblance to German Expressionism in its emotional depiction of the people - particularly peasants and labourers - in its expressive, emotional colour and in its apparent crude, primitive delineation and bold massing of shapes and forms. But although Maggie Laubser's style is so reminiscent / reminiscent of German Expressionism, she nevertheless succeeded in depicting the typical African scene. "Sy beeld mens en dier en bloem en landskap uit as openbaringe van die gesetelike werklikheid soos sy dit in die vertroude siter van die land en volk ervaar het. (9)

Her range of subject matter is small. She is happy, appears to be content to paint the same subject repeatedly. So one finds numerous pictures of harvesters, of the herd-boy, of native girls frequently set among decorative South African flowers, of ducks and geese, of cats and flowers, of cranes or flamingoes, and later of fishermen, their cottages and boats and the sea birds.

In most of her work "there is a stern simplicity of a new country . . . and the angularity of form she so often uses emphasises the elemental subject-matter of her choice. In the peasant-like pattern and strong colour of so many of her interpretations, there is a union of the artist with her motive, harmonising the expression into a concrete unity of subject and feeling. There is an immense love of peaceful nature in her work." (10).

This sensation of peacefulness is usually achieved by regular closed patterns in the composition, heavy bold shapes and gradually curving lines. The bold, bright colour usually adds the contrast and the tension. In the Harvesters (fig. 33) each boy forms his own enclosed shape. The two in the immediate foreground combine to form a larger oval pattern. Finally the three figures form one overall large flat circle through the position of the feet, leading the eye along a line that moves upwards through the figure on the right while the line of a distant cornfield leads the eye back to the figure on the left, moves gradually down the curved back and resumes its circular passage again at the feet. Monotony is prevented by the jagged angular shapes in the boys and cornsheaves within the main pattern. The oval composition is accentuated by the cloud formation in the far background which distinctly echoes the unobtrusive regular shape in the foreground. The colour of the picture adds an emotional intensity. The contrast between glowing yellow and grey-green is violent, introducing a subjective note of apprehension. This emotion of expectant fear is so strong that it dominates the entire picture.

9). G. Dekker: Skone Kunstc. pg 188.
It is interesting to compare Maggie Laubser's interpretations of the African and the Hottentot who form such an integral part of the South African landscape with the interpretations by the other South African expressionist, Irma Stern. Their point of departure, viz: German Expressionism, was initially the same. But while Maggie Laubser concentrates on the humble, the deep human qualities and the simplicity of her subject, Irma Stern concentrates on the exotic, the sensual and the colourful splendour. Maggie Laubser's work appears to be more naive and artless, while Irma Stern's is far more sophisticated, and she expresses the pride and arrogance of the aborigines who once used "to rule eunuchs" (11) whereas Maggie Laubser depicts the submissive, humble servant. While Maggie Laubser's work is quiet, calm and controlled, Irma Stern's pictures are violently emotional. Irma Stern's work is big and startling; it demands attention. Maggie Laubser's work is usually smaller and it does not make such a direct impact. Bouman feels that in spite of the aggressive quality in Irma Stern's work, it will not have such a lasting appeal as the more subtle work by Maggie Laubser:

"Sy (Irma Stern) soek die grillige, selfs in 'n stillswa.
En daaroor bly dit dikwels te veel aan die oppervlakte, daar is te weinig kans vir verdieping. Net by Maggie Laubser feat is, sê Irma Stern altans nie. Die benadering van die eengevang, die uitsuksmutude van die gewone, vloe voort uit die temperament, en hierin verskil die twee vroue sonderlik. Irma Stern wil in elke stuk 'n verrassing gec, maar die verrassing duur vaak kort, omdat die bron te ondiep is. Maggie Laubser is minder opvallend, die verrassing by haar subtiele, omdat dit gegaan word deur 'n fyn skakeling, die resultaat van nuuskruige waarneming en geaardige verdieping.
(12)."

It is easier to find parallels in literature to Maggie Laubser's work than to Irma Stern's. This is probably because Maggie Laubser depicts the ideal, humble, assiduous servant who, through his faithfulness, has become an almost passive part of the farm household. Such a servant is frequently depicted in novels. Irma Stern depicts the untamed people of a primeval /

Africa. pg. 48.
primaeval land. She expresses their pride, their arrogance, their sensuousness. Irma Stern's native models could not be servants. They must be free to move as they wish in their colourful land. Francis Brett Young does, however, depict the regal, free native. One of his descriptions in The City of Gold is a remarkable parallel to the painting of Irma Stern of Swazi Girls (fig. 34) (13). The richness, the warmth, the glowing colour, the dignity of which one is conscious in the painting has been expressed, even clearly stated by the writer. Most of Irma Stern's paintings of the primitive native have an element of the pastoral. They appear to depict a "world untouched by time." As a result of Irma Stern's sophisticated long, flowing line in her drawing her native figures are usually "superbly erect" and they appear to move "slowly, silently." And it is a characteristic of the majority of Irma Stern's pictures that they are "transfused with warm light."

Such would be the character of Irma Stern's native girls if the painter had not had the more sombre outlook of the expressionist. Eugene Marais' well-known character has an innocent, child-like quality which is not altogether expressive of the African tribes. Irma Stern's figures have more of the African character, but simultaneously she "over-dramatized the native." (14). To Irma Stern it appeared that the White Man's civilization had lured the native away from his accustomed care-free life and had imposed the burden of slavery upon him which he could not bear. "... Irma Stern's natives seem to have some turbulent inner life. It is perhaps not the romantic memory of the past but the lack of adjustment to the present that makes them look so sad - unless it be the racial memory of the days when their kings ruled in Africa - the days before civilization had reached their land and sold them into slavery. Their forlorn expression indicates an inner tension, a spiritual drama which Irma Stern's critics find it difficult to reconcile with the myth of the child-like native innocent of all thought and emotion or inner conflict." (15).

15). Ibid. 18. 48 - 49.
But this is probably the painter's own subconscious desire, this forlorn nostalgia, for she maintains that she loves a wild untamed setting which civilization has not touched. She loves the exotic, the unusual, the primitive. It is therefore not surprising that in her painting "Irma Stern speaks in a language which is more impulsive than rational." (16). All her paintings have an emotional intensity and a sensuousness which is sometimes overpowering and even repellent. The canvases are almost invariably large. The colours are always very strong - one can speak of blazing colour - orange, red and green usually predominate. The lines in the drawing are smoothly flowing, suggesting oversophistication and sensuousness. Sometimes the paint is smooth and transparent. Sometimes it is applied in a thick impasto.

Although a definite expressionist emotion is revealed in these paintings which is foreign to the essential African character, Irma Stern has certainly and emphatically expressed the powerful and glowing presence of the indigenous peoples in such an individual manner that her work cannot be ignored. In spite of Bousman's conviction that Maggie Laubser's work is more profound, Irma Stern's painting is undoubtedly more powerful.

An entirely different kind of painting is the decorative-illustrative work by Marina Lemond, who also frequently uses the picturesque African as subject. Her water colours of Beauto rides are well known. These reveal a romantic-impressionist approach. A delicate representation of iridescent light revealing ponies and riders in a hazy setting. Her more recent work moves away from the equivocal impression and a firmer outline and flat areas of colour introduce a distinct decorative quality. But almost inevitably one will find a few objects that reveal weak drawing, weak shapes that break the unity in a rigid composition. This is evident in the Goat Kitchen and in the Goat Girl (fig. 35.) where the limp shapes of the pots in the foreground are disturbing in an otherwise pleasing pattern.

In /

In both pictures Norine Desmond presents the native and the farm animal together, and the union is pleasing. In the Goat Girl there are still traces of realism. There is a suggestion of modelling in the body of the girl. There is a suggestion of recession in the goats and therefore there is a feeling of space. But strong decorative qualities are apparent in the humorous spotted goat and in the essentially decorative modelling in the white goat in the right foreground. In the Goat Witch the decorative is much bolder. The girls are seen as pattern rather than as human beings. The goats are flat, decorative shapes, and are all more or less on the same plane. Bold outlines emphasise the pattern and accentuate the "primitive" design.

Although both pictures have a certain charm, neither is profound. For a deeper expression of the farmyard animal one must again turn to the work by Maggie Laubser who so loved to paint the geese and ducks (fig. 36). She can express their aggressiveness, the clumsiness, their comicalness in a most delightful manner. The placing of dark eyes, the determined dark brushstrokes representing decorative feathers so convincingly depict determined aggressiveness; the juxtaposition of webbed feet express the clumsiness, while the attitude of the head or wings add the humour. The heavy, primitive shapes, and bright, pure colour add an innocent, child-like quality, possibly expressing a childhood memory of the evenings when the painter would go to the dam to watch the snow-white ducks and geese. (17).

In novels one frequently finds descriptions of the farm animals incorporated into the main story. These passages usually reveal an accurate observation of the animals' habits and antics, and frequently introduce a light-hearted touch: e.g. Mof, the little dog about which Langenhoven writes, has a definitive encounter with an angry turkey cock.

17). Maggie Laubser spoke of this memory in the radio talk: My Kontrol, 21 February, 1956.
The donkey is a familiar feature in the Transvaal landscape, and he had already been introduced to Afrikaans literature by Van Bruggen in Amie. Amie would be incomplete without the old grey donkey. In Jaffie, in Eeuromanners by Eeurom (18) two donkeys carry the entire story. This enchanting, simple little book tells the tale of two donkeys — Coo Vaaltyn and Jaffie — and the part donkeys in the past have played in Biblical history. The book opens with a description of a typical Transvaal scene presented with unusual and original figures of speech which add to the child-like quality and freshness of the whole.

The reader is immediately conscious of the writer's deep knowledge and love not only of the little donkeys, but also of all the other little inhabitants of the Transvaal veld.

In order to do full justice to the creatures of the veld and to add an unusual aspect to the descriptions Eeurom frequently forms new words, particularly verbs. This to a certain extent betrays the poet. E.g.

Gelukkig het die patrysie toe uit al die rigtings begin pastetale, en die tarentale het hulle wiseltries-klink wyniger goudwyl, sodat die sand soos 'n dam vol-gestroom het met geluid. (pg 38 - 39)

Coo Vaaltyn het lank ingedagte gastea en kyk na die ou karlcboom wat sy bosaikop nie-ja, nie-ja skud in die wind. (pg 39).

Yet even a never sneak of striking nor startling images. Thore penocrent soos klein alpresboompies, ..." (pg 77) or The entire book, although it presents an original vision of the veld and typical farm life, has a temporary vcharm. The basic message the writer wished to convey — the religious message — is not convincingly expressed because it is far too human to be expounded by an old donkey. The reader is inclined to ask what a Western Transvaal donkey has to do with the donkey in the Bethlehem stable. The synthesis is not successful. The reader is aware of a paradox. The simple adventures of the two donkeys on the farm are naturally insufficient to give the story a permanent value. Yet these scenes make the book appealing and enable it to take its place among other Afrikaans literary works, but whether "Coo Vaaltyn en Jaffie diep spore in die Afrikaanse prosa Vegetrap het" (19) is doubtful.

Maar hy het dadelik besef dat Rooi-Koos wat laer staan, meer kantsou hê as hy en dat sy aanvalbeweging juis sy neerlaag kon versker. Want vandag moet hy die ander baasraak heetelmal en finaal, of die wêreld sal vir hom te nou word hierby die strand. Met 'n skyn-aanval wip hy die fonteinrand uit deur die papkuilatoe en okree: "Kom nou dat ek jou inmekaar kan froomel. Wie is jou duiwelskind?"

Right in front of him, running parallel to the path, a long line of silver trees curved up and over the broad rounded top of the hill now flooded in sunlight. There, in a single sweeping line, they stood, tall and slender and straight, about fifty of them, sharply outlined against the green of the grass and the deep blue of the sky - all wet and glittering and swaying lightly as in a slow dance. They were the most marvellous trees Jannie had ever seen. And the most marvellous of them all was their leader, a little apart from their rest on the very crest on the hill. Set in a perfect semi-circle of blue, the tree seemed to be made not of root, trunk or branch but of light, pure light. For each short-pointed leaf had its own special gleam, silvery light run up and down the long slim trunk and from its shimmering depths the silver tree flashed from five different points an alternate blue, red and orange spark.

Die wat die Kaap ken, sal weet dat daar 'n pad oor die nek tussen Constantia-berge en die suidoostelike hange van Tafelberg na Houtbaai loop.
Hierdie pad is seker een van die mooiste in die land. Dit kronkel eers langs die beboste hange suid van Nursery-kloof en Kirstenbosch, verduy dan eindelik oor die nek, af na die blou water van die baai in die verte.
En die uitsig oor die Kaapse Vlakte na die verre Hottentota-Holland is iets besondere. Die wye, wit boog van die Valbaai-kus loop uit in die puntige spitte van Koesberg en Kaap Hangklip. En na links staan die hof koepel van die Somerset-Sneeukop en die Wemmershoeks-reeks helder teen die luglyn.
Daar word gesê dat die wyk Constantia, en veral die dele van Constantia geleë teen die bergkliming, vir die rykes as woonbuurt bedoel is. Die grond is intensief bewerk en vrugbaar, die omgewing van berg en bos en golwende heuwels enig.
Daar is ou wynplase, ryk aan tradisie. Daar is Groot-Constantia en Tokai en Alphen.

Ons sal moet uitbrei . . .

23: Op agtien myl van die dorp het ons weggeswaai van die groot pad en op tussen Verland so pragtige, uitgestrekte boorde. Die lemoenbome, wat nog hier en daar 'n glielende vrug getoont het, was wit in die blom. Die hele lugruim was wonderlik bewierook. Op die land was trekkers. Tussentdie bome het volk met meganiiese pompe gespuit. 'n Groot reservoir was in aanbou.

24: Dele van Vieroringkloof is onbetreda aarde. Dele is so diep dat die rotsmure tot 'n paar voet van mekaar duiel en duiwende voete opwaarts duisel. Die plekke waar die lug soos 'n smal stukkie hoop vertoon, waar-in dan selfs bedaga sterre in die bloute skyn, waar die aas nooit kon en geen voëls sing nie.

Daar 18 dit voor hulle - 'n geweldige stutmuur en baasion na die ander, geanker aan die aarde deur dun stut op dun stut, bowe-sinlik skoon. Tussen-in is daar diep en ontoeganklike klowe waaruit die water wit en tuimelend bars. Op die ontelbare hellings en lyste 18 die vardi en ontoeganklike klowe waaruit die water wit en tuimelend bars. Deur die loop van ontelbare jare 'n bleek en rotsige baan geaspoel het.

Aan die heel verste ent skiet 'n purper sull uit die bodem van die kloof. Hoër, steeds hoër dwaal hul blink, totdat die kruin verlore raak in die dreigende newels.

25: Klossies, jul bewe en bibber:
Is dan die aandlug so koud?
Moet julle so teen die westewind koes?
Sal hy vir julle die blou en die goud,
Alles verwoes?

Klossies jul bewe en bibber;
Drink m'ur die son en wees bly!
Goud, blou en rooi is die lewe; en sag
Waal ons ou westewind koel oor die vK

Nog is dit dag.

26: 'n Fluitjie carriers omhoomde poel,
Van swart-bruin staande water, lowendig
Met paddavindig, swarter as die swart
Wat diep 18 in die hart
Van sandveld tjinkertjies, wat weelderig
Hul wit bloemvlerke uitopsom om die lig
Van die ondergaande son te vang,
En watermannotjies wat weel
Oor die oppervlakte, en 'n nee wat hang,
Veralde deur sy maakster, aan die stel
Van 'n verlepte varingstrui.
Die geel
Van wind-verspelde doringboomblomme swem
Die kant langs as 'n kring van goud
En die naaldeagtige as gloeiende straal
Val deur die blare in lopies skaduwee en kleur
Deur die koelte van die watervlak getem
Tot die milde sagtheid wat die goud se geur.
Laat uitbreek honderdvoud.
En die water, roerloos soos 'n paal.
Wat daar al jare staan,
'n Bruin-rooi reiervoël wat met sy bek
Die laaste sonstraal opvang, en die maan
Nog halfpád deur die berg se rand bedek.
En nog nie vol nie, op sy vere voel.

27:
As die auring verle en die tulp nie meer bloei nie;
As die somer se groen met die droogte vergrys;
As die panwater ook dat jy nie meer kan roei nie,
En die koning-flamink na die noorde verreis;
As die Piet-my-vrou-stem, wat die boes het laat lewe, Vorstom in die stilte van najaar se krag,
En die bergewael se bont vir die laaste maal sweewe
Oor 'n veld wat verstik na die wintervog smag,
Is dit grondig bewys dat die groen en die geure
Wat somer segege het, vir ewig vergaan?
Dat die kou nie kan skilde met net soveel kleure
Soos die voorjaar gebruik het oor weiland en laan?
Daar is sa; in die stamme, en krag in die blare,
Nog diep in die hart van die hout opgevou;
En nog bloed vir die lewe bewaar in die are Van die bol van die bloem wat sy lewe behou.

As die jare verby spoed en die skemering nader,
Die donkergroen swart van die uiterste nag -
En die skimme van gister-voor-gister vergader,
En die misstep van vroëér sy vergelding verwag;
As die goue skaal breek en die vensters gesluit word,
En die donker daarbuite tot binne-in dring;
As die lied wat so lief deur die winde gefluit word
Goei naamoes van troost tot die martelaar bring -
Is dit die geldige getuisnis dat wat in die verlede
Geskyn het, tot niks in die duister vergaan?
Of nog verder bewys van kraggewende vrede
Vir die siel wat sy eie beproewering verstaan?
Die foute van gister, die duur ondervinding,
Die maandag-awakheid - dit tel by die som
Van lewe wat loop tot sy eind 'lik' verslinging
Aloer hy tot kragtiger lewe ontblom.
(C. Louis Leipoldt.

28:
Ek kom om 'n kransie van rou te breng,
op kindergraaffies 'n traan te pleng.

Maar kyk, dit 'n fees wat my oog gewaar van blommetjies, blommetjies ammelekaar, op runke stingel oor graaffie en steen - soos graan op die lande, aaneen, aaneen;
soos kindertjies selwe in feesgewaard,
in hupp'lende dans op die windjie se maat;
spirowit hul kleertjes en rosorooi - die sonlig se glans op hul hemelee tooi.

O, moedertjies wat in die verte nog ween om blompeties ontname, wat God had goeleen, kom kyk, uit elkeen en elk bittere traan is 'n heldere blompie weer opgestaan.

Die net of die Vader se "Vertrou!"
"My blomme sal groei oor die kranse van rou,

"Ek gee weer terug wat gegoed is aan My:
"waar blomme gesaai is, sal blomme gerooy."

29:

Die blomme langs die padjies
En blomme by die wal,
Die blomme net waar ek kan kyk,
Die bontheid oweral.

Die rooies wenk die luidate,
Viooltjies knik gedwec,
Die wind ontlok die soetste geur
En wieg die blommebee.

En waarom wenk die blomme so,
En waarom spreit hul geure wyd?
Die by kom oor die tuin gesoem,
Hy suig hul heuning uit.

Dit ritsel langs die gangie,
Dit trippel oor die pad.
Nou waarom was die sy gespin,
Die kant en 'k weet nie wat?

Die oë kyk brutaal uit
En anders luik gedwec -
Cupido swoef van blom tot blom
En bring sy pyle mee.

30:

U het sy vesels uit die pyn gesmeer van vreeslike eenzaamheid, sy dorings stoot verbitter af wie tot hom nadertree; sy takke worstel immer met die dood waar skril uit bossie, somber blaar-ontbloot, bonbaleos kerm van die etek me wee.
Maar eenmaal in die nag dra hy die groot wit blom se kroon: al wat U hom wou gee.

Hier neem oene 'n siel gestalte aan wat almal afwyk, goed vergeld met kwaad een nors, afkerig van die wêreld staan;
wat worstel teen die dood en bitter haat, met slegs die enkel troos wat God hom bied:
die snel en helder vreugde van 'n lied.

Antonie skuif sy hoed so 'n bietjie agteroor en gaan staan in die skruul koelte van 'n doringboom, waarin dit gaan asof daar 'n duiend sonbesig tegelyk begin sing het. Selfs tot in sy trekkersjil dring die grootse kontras deur: om hom, vir oor wat sy oog kan sien, is die rooi sandaarde, en hier die ou doringboom wat wie weet hoeveel tientalle van jere al hier suukelgroei; .

A, ons ou oesewu, wat was jy nie vir ons ou nasie in die dae van trek en vlug en wêre nie! Die kraamkamer, die sickkamer, die stofkamer, die slaapkamer en voorhuis, die krygaveating, die bedekamer, die heilige der heilige van die huisaltaar om 'n volk skoon te hou!

Once more the kingfisher
Admires the gleam
Of his rainbow-reflection
In the gay stream;
The crow, sooty-coated,
With never a pause
Scratches up the sow-mealies
And raspily caws;
The dazzling sunbird,
Wee flower-like fellow,
Sips honey from blossoms
To make his voice mellow;
And the wild green canary,
Without stay or stop,
Drops shining song-bubbles
From the treetop.

The sun descends and trails his clouds of glory,
The evening shadows flock on hill and plain;
The sun descends and ends day's little story,
Rules off the blotted compt of loss or gain,
Of love and hate, of joy and grief and pain.
Now healing darkness binds day's burning scars;
The sun is set; light gone; but night hath stars.

At last came the year of the great drought, the year of 1862. From end to end of the land the earth cried for water. Man and beast turned their eyes to the pitiless sky, that like the roof of some brazen oven arched overhead. On the farm day after day, month after month, the water in the dams fell lower and lower; the sheep died in the fields; the cattle, scarcely able to crawl, tottered as they moved from spot to spot in search of food. Week after week, month after month, the sun of food. Week after week, month after month, the sun

40: Die somer was dood.
Die goudgeel blare het fladderend van die borne geval en in 'n goudgeel laag op die kou, nat grond gaan 16. Daar het hulle vermuif, en die tuin was vol van die geur van die sterwende lewe.
Die borne het met hulle kaal takke teen die diepblou herfslug gestaan, en die vosse het nog saans laat in hulle met kwetterende stemme gema.
Ooral in die natuur het iets gesterwe, en in die lug was iets verlate, dit het oor die velde gelê, oor die tuin, in die eonskyn, in alles.
Die somer het so ommerbaar in die najaar vergly, soos een stroompie water in 'n ander, en die natuur het verander en vervol en net die kaal velde met die witverbleekte gras, die platte wit mieliesronke op die lende, die dooi runke op die akkers en die poedelnaakte bome het agtergebly.
En sy wou weg.

41: En nie wat ons nou ken, staan ooit alleen,

42: Die skemerings het om die bome kom woon en hul stamme was in 'n diewe; net op die heuwel- ronding het 'n klompie bloedkombome met hul donker blare toen die aandiguit gestaan. En agter hulle het die sterre verskyn, rein en blink en met die aand die temps wackel. Die stamme van die voëls was stil en die vure het 'n vlam by die strooiing begin brand - eensam onder die rantjies.

43: Onsindig ver, doer anderkant die kaal vlaktes, sink die son, soos 'n moedeloos wandelaar agter die wêreldkant in. En noulik is die laaste sonrooi weggekom en in die wees, of 'n koel windjie ontstaan uit die kaal laagtes en soos 'n bly boodskap dat die reën kom, seil hy kalm-frisse oor die uitgetrapte, doodgeblerde vlakte-onwindigheid heen, die wêreld word vroliker en opgewek wanneer die bloubooe op die twee klip-oortrekte rantjies hulle stywerige taak takke in die wind.

44: 'n Weemoed groei in oom Soos as binne oor die reën wat val noudat die droogte hulle gebreek het. Wonderlik tog, noudat die reën kom, die reën wat die laaste winterkoue sal verdrywe, nou vol hy hoe arm en droog hy hier binne staat, hoe arm en droog al sy broers was, dit was reg 'n droogte binnekant en buitekant. ... Die groot stryd binne hom is byna klaar.

45: I knew what the six animals were — four cows, one young bull, and a magnificent old fellow with a glorious head and great spiral horns. I carried his picture in my eye and could pick him out instantly wherever he stood and however motionless; for, incredibly difficult as it is to pick out still objects in the bush before your eye becomes accustomed to it, it is wonderful what you can do when your eye is in and you are cool and intent and know what you are looking for. I had the old bull marked down as mine, and knew every detail — his splendid bearing, strong shaggy neck with mane to the withers and bearded throat, the soft grey dove-colour of the coat with white stripes, the easy balancing movement in carrying the massive horns as he rantered away, and the trick of throwing them back to glide them through the bush.

46: Toe die eerste strale oor die bosse uitgelat en die onteigene restriepje van die blare laat flonker, begin skielik die eierandige konsert van in trop keloobus-ap, wat oorkant die opening hoog tussen die lower onbeweeglik die nag deur gesit het. Nouliks het die ou leier, wat by so 'n trop altyd aanwezig is, sy eerste groewe baasnote uitgestoot - "oa-ôrrr ...
oa-ôrrr ..." - of dosyne ander val uit verskillende rigtige in en laat die hond bos loop. Uit die laaste gutturale note sleg beginnend, styg die koor van stemme ritmies, al meer trillend en met toenemende krag op tot in hoogtepunk, om dan weer ewe gelykmatig slegter en sugter te daal en weg te stervel. Tussenin klink die skerp "kJou! kJou!" van swart-ape, wat hulle graag in die hoogste closeklap van die nagwêreld meng - en dié word onderdeld deur die twee pragtige kolobusse van Kilimandjaro verteenwoordig.

(Sangiro.

Uit oerwoud en vlakte. pg. 153.)

47:

Op die oerwoud bo-op die berg lê nog dik newel-banke, maar die reën is verbly; 'n laatste paar wolke dryf haaistig verby na die westkant, in hul lug vlog die lug hier en daar met groot blink druppelle deuraf, en laat die wye uitgestrektheid van hemel-bloë sonder
'in vlekke aan die sonskyn oor.

Aangenaam verwarmend val die môresoon op die klein rotskoppies, en een waarvan ons twee swartwêrpsies is die pas herbeg gekry het; en weldra kom talryke dassies uit die spleet en gate te voorskyn om hulle in die strale te koester. Dik, vet oes, met glansende bruin ville, soek hulle gewone sitplekken uit en skyn na nike beter te verlang na om heedag so doodstil te kan lê en kyk na die son nie. Maar die kleintjies, ronde, mollige goedjies, swelend van lewe onder hul koester-ende wolwêrele, begin speellustig te piep en gry op en af langs gladde klippe op hul gomlaastiekpootjies.

Skislik verskyn in die donker openkie onder een vandie roste twee leeuwenaapjies, wat met mutger, lewendige ogien, bewêende swart nouakkappies, en gespitate ronde oortjies, op die vreemde omgewing uitkyk. Hul naam is op die vreemde, vir hul onbekende giskaap en gepie, wat hul verwondering vir die leaste wêre gemaak het, en half angstig daarin hul koppies, onderwyl hul namselend rondkyk, nou hierheen, dan daar-heen, en telkens die geluidje van 'n ander kant af kom.
Noulik het die voorste leutjie 'n voorlopige versigtig buitekant die groot gesit of twee onnasale klein dassies jaag mekaar spelend op 'n rif van die rots langs en vlak voor sy neus verbly.

(Ibid. pg 198.)

48:

Die manier waarop hy te werk gaan, is wel onbeskaf, dog toep. Met lang, swart hande plat op die aand gedruk, gespierde arms na buite gekrom, rula manuere orent, staan hy sy voorlyf geweldig op- en afruk, en met elke ruk wat hy gee, daag hy die ander tartend uit.

Die trou verstaan wat gebeure is: die mannetjie stel hom vir die vakte kommandantskap verkiesbaar, en desweerstaan die uitleg van so 'n verkiesing uitein-lik afhang van wie die sterkte is, begin 'n aantal an die grootste mannetjies ook sommer dadelik die duin op pronk.

Hoog teen die top bly hul op 'n beskée afstand vand makkaar staan, neem ook daardie ek-ka-die-sterkte-kandidaat-houding aan en begin elk hom luidrustig kandidaat-houding aan en begin elke hom luidrustig verkiesbaar stel. So duur dit 'n paar minute voort, 'n oor verdowonde geneen wat belaglik sou geklink het, as dit nie met so’n verwoede gedreig gepaard gegaan het nie.

Dit lyk naderhand of die mannetjie wat hom die eerste verkiesbaar gestel het, tevrede is dat hy behoorlik aanspraak op die kommandantskap gemaak het; want met sy rug en stert terdeë gekrom begin hy styf-styf rondstap, so styf dat selfs sy voorpote nie die minste buig nie, en op elke stap volg daar ‘n geôf-ôf en ‘n tandgekners van die ander wêreld:

Fees. pg. 21 - 22.)

49: ’n Twee honderd tree onderkant die volstruiswyfie kom ’n trop wildehonde oor die duinmee aangestorm. Nog ’n oomlik, en die met haar gedaan; maar toe die honde so te sê op haar is, klap sy swak met die vlerke en vlug val-val die langte af, struiikel, strompel, alsaan jammerlik voor die honde neer – waag ongeloofs om hul besig te hou en die mannetjie kans te gee om met die kuikens weg te kom.

Ver onder in die laagte, ’n myl of meer van die kuikens af, val-val die wyfie langs ’n duinstraat af met die grusamme honde gewaarlik kort op haar hakke; maar toe sy eers die oop vlaktes onderkant die duinreeks haal, word haar hêne skielik reg. ’n Tree of twee voor haar wrede vervalers swink sy ineens ongewoonlik vinnig en hardloop skoon onder die gefopte wêreld uit:

50: Toe hy langs Hlabisa staan, het die ou met die punt van sy agaaai na iets links voor hulle uit gewys. Panie het gekyk en gekyk … maar kon net hê geel-bruin gras sien, en in die agtergrond ’n vaste bank groen fluutjieer in met wit pluimseade.

Hibima se "u ya yi bona – sy hom …" op fluistertoon, het Panie kortsaam laat raak. Hy kon glad geen wildbok of lewendige ding sien nie, en hy het begin bewe van opgewondeheid.

Toe Hlabisa merk die baas met die roer lê nie aan nie, het hy lêer gebuk, sy agaaai in volle lengte na die bok toe gehou, en vir Panie gefluister om met sy oog oor die agaaai te korrel. Panie het so gemaak, maar kon nog steeds niks sien nie. Toe swaai die bok sy kop om ’n vlieg of iets teen sy blad weg te jag.

Panie het sy naam diep wag getrek en gefluister: "nei ya yi bona – ek sien hom."

Hy het ’n paar keer diop naam gehaal, sy of stip op die plek gehou, en toe begin die volle vorm van die bok skielik duidelik uit te slaan. Vir ’n paar oomblikke het Panie homself lelike dinge toegeweeg omdat hy so blind was, sy eenuwee bymekaar geruk, en effens agteruit gestaan om die gewer aan sy skouer te bring.

(F.J. Schoeman.
Panie se veldkundige.

51: Toe ok wegatap, het Kalimbo ook ’n paar woorde te af gehad: "Het dit baas gesien hoe met hy (die kameel-perd) die baas se woorde op?"

En toe ok sommer niks lus voel om te praat nie, het Kalimbo maar aangegaan: "Al die tyd wat die baas gepraat het, die ou stinkbul se bolip het op en af.
Miskien hy het geprobeer om te lig, my baas.
Miskien ook hy wou seblief sê vir die baas."
"Waarom, Kalimbo?"
"Die seblief wat die groot dankie is, my baas.
Die baas het mooi met hom gespreek. Die wilde goete is baie slim, my baas. Hy voel hier hy ay stort wanneer die mens hy het nie lelike plane nie..."

Die diere.
By water en rivier kan ons weer veel een diep verwantskap met die arme diere, twee olifante wat hulle lywe spoel, die wemeling van insekte en mieere, die bontbok en onmutige bobbejaan,
'n haastige vlakvark stert hoog in die lug en subtrop wat aarslond stroom too guan, met verwag troepie wild verskrik op vlug.
Die diepste vreesdaasheid droom in die kuil waar baie monde gaan die lewe deel, gedurig maar op loer na wat daar skuil waar elke skaduwes sy angste teel.
Want binne hiërde lewe, warm en vry, vag steeds die klou wat een laat aeterby.

53:
The Zebras.
From the dark woods that breathe of fallen showers,
Harnessied with level rays in golden rains,
The zebras draw the dawn across the plains
Wading knee-deep among the scarlet flowers.
The sunlight, zithering their flanks with fire,
Flashes between the shadows as they pass
Barred with electric tremors through the grass
Like wind along the gold strings of a lyre.

Into the flushed air anoting rosy plumes
That amould upon their feet in drifting fumes,
With dove-like voices call the distant fillies.
While round the herds the stallion wheels his flight,
Engine of beauty volatile with delight.
To roll his mare among the trampled fillies.

maar daglank was die water onverstoord onder die warm lug, en stil, en ongerep van giftige aal of krokodil - 'n heilige poel, waarvan sy stum sku weggesluipt het in die klim vertroude bosse en oewers dik van geurige palmiet en warm alik; maar daar het hy, verware enkeling, die hete middag juruij deurgebring en uitgegoen deur die aarlig water of roerloos gedryf met die koel geklaster soos van groot stroomversnelling in oor in sy ore, ruglings gestrek, sy oë verblind, verlore in die gladeland van lug en wolk; of soms het hy geluidloos in die donker kolk geduik, af, af, deur kouer skudwees langs stroom van strenger waterkmers, en met vrees gekkeer, maar sidderend van vreug, uit daar die nag wat soos 'n week aarlig bloem na die helder dag en suiwolf son hier selfsaaan rank -

60:
Oor 'n groen poel wat stil en dik was van die bronalaai en die warm alik het Raka op die lou voormiddag geleun om soos 'n boes te drink, en lui gesteun van genot, die aarlig honde diep ingezeg in die meel-angte wortels en die pappery wat deur sy vingers borrel; en, toeg hy sat en swaar was van die suip, het hy in die koel gat sy lyf laat inmak, aksam, en gevoel hoe die stink helle langs hom kruip en ho die poel se dik room breek. Dit was sy gebied, hier waar die boomworteis in die droë riet en papkuil van die stroom se diep boëte rank, en die hele warm dag die zoet stink opstoom langs die rand van die woud. Dan het hy uit die water gestyg en die glimmende huid met 'n poel gestryk dat die druppels straal op die waterplante, en met lang kale oor die tama suiggrond na die bosse gestap.

verby die klim oewerbosse sa koers gevind waar daglank donker la en nis en die rus blare druppel, tot hy later in van bone en blou van die skerps, geel buffelgraas en die vlakte uit aarlig het; maar altyd rusteloos nog voort met gerekte tred onder die brandende maakte son wat horison tot horison met wit brand vul.

62:
moes dit gewees het as die swart buffelbul wat die bosgange en grasruigtes vul met hees geenuwe en bulk, soërens styf in die voetpad gela het waar die swaar lyf in die knieë geknuk het; as die krokodil hoog op die sand uit gela het en ril soos 'n klein akkedisie wat die kinders met 'n stok geskenk het; - of die ou spiesvegter, die genebok, oordwara, gebreek, stil tussen die polle waa;
as die vlakvark gela het in die gras met sy wit lemme, en sy oë soos 'n vis se oë styf.

(Raka: pg. 8.)

63:

En nou
het Koki strak deur die klam tunnels gehou die stillste bosse waar die takke bo, verward geestrel, in die digte, hof wasdom smukklou, en die helder dag skemerig en vol drup is; maar sy wag en luister het geen geluid gevang as net die drup-drup en die lang klaas-akree van 'n sku bosvok érens ver; en akree het hy gesien, soos 'n klein stert wat val, die flitse van 'n rooi papegaa tussen stum en stam;

64:

En nou 't hy oor die oper lengtes gegaan er blare, waar die bome enkelder staan, en kleurige klimop tot die kruine rank ....
tot die rand van die vlakte waar hy lank oor die wye middagwêreld uitgetuur 't:
of die Swarte te sien was; maar die stil war
van die hitte was daar, en die ver bome ongewis met die gerate opdamp van die nuimiddag en die oerwoud reën; en nêrens het hy hier Raka gewaar nie - die vaal wakkediere het stil in die akadula gestaan of geweel.
Toe 't hy weer die småe plante geseck wat lei der die oewerbosse met die groot rivier, er Raka, Raka, die akela dier wat uitloer digter die gron akui of onhoorbaar agter die rankes akui, et in hom gemaal, in sy ore geklop, en telkens wou hy die swart kopp in 'n struik eien of in 'n digte trêe geel bloemme en besiesie .... tot hy eindelik loa uit die bome geworsteel, die silwer hoog van die breër water uit voor sy oog sien struk het; en hier 't hy die nat spoer gekry in die modder en gevolg en verloor in die poele en weer gekry - die swaar ding as sloepeel waar hy brok en ploa en dring der die hoogste riete - en Koki het getrap in die baai van die spore oor die wit krap en die visies wat pal in die lou water hou van die vlak plase; die snysig 't geklou aan sy knieë, en die bont kloosa afgeskeur waar hy deur die verbuigde akuine riete beur.

(Raka: pg. 26.)
"Eendag het ons sommer buie swaar gekry. Die hele nag het dit gereën en die hele oggend het die water gestort. Selfs die bulbie was riviere. Toe die son na sononder se kant toe begin val, toe laat hy die wolke hier na sonop se kant afgaan, en die strale verbind jou sommer hier van die water of.

"Mmapoulin, Mmapoulin, wat is daardie mooi ding?"

"Nee, Vadertjie, dit is die nek van die weerlig-vool (rotsboog)."

"Wat is die weerlig-vool, Mmapoulin?"

"Nee, Grootmoeder, dit is die vool wat daar in die wolke woon. Het julle dan nie gesien nie? Nee, julle het ook gehoor. Dit was net tsak-taak, toe is hy verby, en toe was dit wrrrrrrr soos hy verbyvlieg, en toe was dit: gaan sit, en daar lê hy sy eier."

"Mmapoulin, ek gaan die eier hal."

"Waar sal jy die eier kry?"

"Ek het hom gesien. Hy het daar by Tounaberg gaan sit."

"Jê-jê-jê, my kind, daardie vool se eier word nie gevat nie. Hy sal jou kom soft, en jy sal hom hier in die huis bring. As hy kwaw is, dan slaan hy sommer vuur uit die klippe. Jy sal vir ons dinge in die huis roep."

"Nee, dan skiet ek hom met Pappie se geweer."

"O hoo, grootman, jy ken nie daardie vool nie. Hy sluk sommer die vuur en die koedl van daardie geweer in en spoeg hom dan weer op jou uit. Waar sal jy dan heengaan?"

(G.H. Franz, Moeder Poulin.
pg 4-5.)

After the savagery of the Berg there was something subtly moving to him in this sunset pastoral; the spirit of Eden pervaded the amber air; he felt as though by some miracle he had been transeported backward into a world which had never lost its primal innocence, a world untouched by time. And then, as they reached the level of the village, there came to him a revelation of beauty more poignant, perhaps, because it was human. Here the stream, above a little ford, had been deepened to form a watering-place, a still pool where dragon-fies sunned themselves on the floating leaves of blue water-lilies; and towards this, advancing obliquely to meet them as they drew near, came a winding file of young women with gourds for the carrying of water poised on their heads. They moved slowly, silenty, superbly erect, unconscious of anything but their task, with the grace and stateliness of a classical frieze come to life. The sun, dipping red to the line of the Berg, enriched the nut-brown nakedness of shoulder and torso and thigh till their oiled skins glowed with a sheen of satin, so that their slender bodies, from head to foot, appeared to be transfused with warm light. It was a revelation of beauty which Janua was to remember all through his life, yet brief as it was entrancing.
