DEDICATION

This piece of work is dedicated to all those who relentlessly endeavoured to promote peace in Burundi most especially South African diplomats who sometimes endured sleepless nights by trying to bring Burundian warring parties to a common understanding so as to resolve the civil conflict.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I would like, first and foremost, to recognize the Almighty God for His grace which sustained and enabled me to write and complete this thesis when it had seemed impossible to do so after losing my Dad and going through very trying moments. I also thank God for the financial provisions that He provided considering that I had no sustained financial resources committed towards pursuing my doctoral studies.

I would like also to extend my sincere gratitude to my supervisor, Prof. Philip Frankel for willingly accepting to supervise me when I was experiencing serious supervision crisis in my Department. His thoughtful supervision, thoroughness, constructive comments and encouragement made this research a reality.

I am very grateful to the former Head of Department, International Relations Prof. John Stremlau for his very challenging remarks during the designing of the research proposal. His comments were essential in providing me with a clear focus of the interest of this research. Moreover, the financial assistance that he extended to me as head of the Center for Africa’s International Relations enabled me to meet a substantial part of my study requirements.

I am indebted to the acting Head of Department, Prof. Garth Shelton and Prof. Rod Alence for their critical comments for my proposal. Their insights were helpful in guiding me to critically look at the scope of the study and technical areas of the research.

I owe much gratitude to all my interviewees, who sacrificed their precious time sometimes up to two hours by talking with me during interviews. Most especially, I wish to extend my heartfelt thanks to Ambassador Magete Gédéon, who went out of his way to help me by fixing appointments with various important personalities, including the former President of Burundi, Pierre Buyoya. I am equally thankful to Ambassador Magete for his sacrifice in securing for me enormous documents on Burundi’s peace process.
Finally, many thanks go to, my dear family (most especially my late Dad, and Mum who blessed me in various ways to be what I am in life), colleagues and friends who extended spiritual and moral support to me throughout the course of writing this research. My fiancée, Peace Kinani and Kin, you were so inspiring to me during undertaking of the corrections to this research.

This research investigates the role played by external actors in contemporary African civil conflicts with specific attention to South Africa’s leading role in addressing Burundi’s intractable civil conflict. The inquiry was guided by looking at SA’s efforts in managing Burundi’s peace process in partnership with key external parties such as the Regional Initiative for peace in Burundi, AU and the UN; and by examining the level of success of SA’s involvement in the peace process and limitations encountered in pursuing diplomatic/political and military efforts aimed at resolving the civil conflict. The theories of conflict resolution and protracted social change, and scholarly and policy literature on intervention were drawn upon to frame the research.

The struggle for political power explains the key root cause to Burundi’s civil conflict; rival politicians manipulated ethnicity and the past injustices, which are rooted in colonial policies of divide and rule, as tools in an attempt to accede to power and thereby, gain economic advantage at the expense of others. SA diplomatic efforts played an important role in addressing this by advocating for political and military power sharing.

In order to reconcile and manage differences in approaches that were advocated to deal with the Burundi civil conflict, SA mobilized for support in Burundi’s neighbouring countries so as to back a peaceful solution to address the conflict. Further, in an effort to bolster its troops and, therefore, expand operations designed to promote peace in Burundi, SA had to merge into the African Mission in Burundi, and cooperate with the UN in order for the latter to render impetus to the peace process by, providing necessary resources and political support for the Burundi peace mission, and subsequently to assume the mission by taking over from the African mission.

Although SA’s troop deployment provided protection for the former Hutu exile politicians and thereby, encouraged them to participate in negotiations and the transitional government, which participation increased chances of success in the peace process, however, SA did not do much in peacekeeping under the UN due to inadequate military equipments; civilians continued to be killed in the presence of SA troops, even though, under the UN their role extended to include civilian protection.
To the extent that SA’s intensive diplomatic efforts resulted in the Arusha Peace and Reconciliation Agreement for Burundi, however, a number of Burundian parties did not participate in the signing of the agreement and the rebel movements were excluded from the process. Thus, the Arusha peace process failed to attain consensus in addressing Burundi’s contentious issues.

Although the UN peacekeepers in Burundi, of which SA was part, had a Chapter VII mandate to enforce the peace of which civilian protection was part of their mission, they did not exercise it. Intervention was constrained by the Burundian government; they argued that the ultimate authority in maintaining security throughout the country rested on them. Moreover, it is difficult if not impossible to observe UN traditional peacekeeping norms while at the same time having to implement the responsibility to protect, which has been occasioned by the post-Cold War world, in which human rights have gained wider recognition, and international norms of sovereignty and non-intervention redefined. Thus, strict observance of the UN traditional peacekeeping norms, inhibit intervention aimed to protect civilians facing catastrophic circumstances or under imminent threat.
