ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Without the generous support and financial assistance by the Postgraduate Merit Award, this research would not have been possible.

To all at the Market Theatre Laboratory: Vanessa Cooke, Dan Robbertse and the students, thank you for all your help, support and time in assisting me to develop and understand the true essence and purpose of the Lab.

A gracious appreciation goes to my supervisor, my ‘whale’ and friend, Mr Warren Nebe. Your support, guidance and pushing abilities have made me into ‘a clear thinking academic’.

To my calm-inducing angel of an editor, Toto, thank you for not giving up on me and tolerating my flowery and repetitive language, and often minimal time constraints.

To my family and friends who have given me the space, support and love and have help to read, edit, cry and smile with me, thank you.

To my inspirational and always sensational sister, your wisdom and ‘go-getter’ attitude has lifted me up in times of dark. Your professionalism and expertise have enabled me to strive for the greater me. Always know you’re my everything, thank you Catherine.

Thank you to Michael for the long loan of your computer equipment, after 34 000 words I hope you can still use the hardware.

To those who contributed by means of guidance, interviews, documents, comments and precious time, I sincerely thank you.
ABSTRACT

This study investigates the Market Theatre Laboratory’s training programme, and evaluates its relevance for the young South African actor. The researcher identifies certain transformation problems around language, curriculum, homogeneity and learner-centred pedagogy. This study offers suggestions and identifies specific changes that can be implemented to assist the Market Theatre Laboratory in adapting to the transformation of South Africa.

Chapter One of this research report investigates the Market Theatre Laboratory as a training institution during the apartheid and post-apartheid eras. The study notes that the Market Theatre Laboratory reflects the tumultuous changes South Africa has undergone and is still experiencing. Chapter Two pays specific attention to current practices within the training programme. It is within the training programme that transformation problems are recognised and are addressed in the following chapters. Chapter Three delves into a comprehensive examination of language problems that have been discovered. Chapters Four and Five address the problems dealing with curriculum, homogeneity, ‘top-down’ teaching, outcomes-based education and product-orientated learning. A process-orientated pedagogy is suggested in Chapter Six.

This methodology values process-orientated learning. The learning process of each individual should form part of the training programme being offered at the Laboratory.

This study concludes with several suggestions intended to support the Laboratory in their continued adaptation to South Africa’s transformation project.
