
BY

PHILILE MASANGO

An independent Research Report submitted to the Department of Journalism and Media Studies in the Faculty of Humanities, in partial fulfilment of the requirements of the Master of Arts degree in Journalism and Media Studies.

UNIVERSITY OF THE WITWATERSRAND, JOHANNESBURG

16 February 2009
DECLARATION

I declare that this research paper is my own work and that no part has been previously submitted to any University or institution of Higher Learning as a requirement for the award of any academic qualification.

Signed……………………………..Date…16 February 2009…………………..
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

His word says “Kucala kokuhlakanipha kumesaba Nkulunkulu” and therefore firstly, I would like to thank God, the Almighty for the strength and wisdom He gave me to start and complete this project. Secondly I would like to thank the following people, without whom this academic piece would probably have been impossible; my supervisors Professor Carolyn Hamilton and Lesley Cowling; your knowledge, guidance and understanding is highly appreciated and valued. My classmate Michael Tsingo, thanks for the support when I really needed a push and for providing clarity when it seemed the way ahead was dark.

Thanks to Wendy Klaasen, and George Durant, for helping with the Afrikaans translations. Natasha Tshabalala thanks for proof-reading this piece of work. Appreciation also to the Mail & Guardian newspaper, particularly the librarian, Siwela Mamphiswana for the warmth shown to me, and allowing me to retrieve newspaper articles at no cost. Thanks to my friends Nomahlubi Matiwane and Zethu Dlamini for the prayers and support. You made me feel that this piece of work was mine as much as it was yours. And last, but certainly not least, much appreciation to my family, particularly my late father S.V. Masango, for sowing in me, the seed and passion for education; you have done well Ntuse lemhlophe.
ABSTRACT
The primary aim of this study was to investigate how, and in what ways, the issue of intellectuals and intellectual activity is engaged in the media, specifically by investigating what issues were raised in the media by the formation of the Native Club in 2006. I examined how issues about the Native Club entered public debate through the media and which individuals spoke in the debate. To fulfil the objectives of the research, I mapped and analysed writings on the topic in the mainstream, commercial English and Afrikaans newspapers as well as other text-based media forums, such as websites, for a period of three months from the inception of the Native Club. I then used interviews and text analysis to answer the primary question of the research. By drawing on media theories such as agenda-setting, I also sought to answer questions about the mechanisms by which the debate entered into and stayed in the media, as well as how these debates were framed. The findings of this research reveal that although some newspapers did not cover the Native Club at all, in the more educated and affluent Afrikaans and English-language newspapers, media engagement with the issue was extensive, suggesting that this sector of the media was widely available as a space for public deliberation. However, the findings reveal that this did not necessarily translate to the media being able to fulfil all of their responsibilities as a tool for participatory democracy, because they failed to question and bring out some of the contentious issues about the Native Club, such as its perceived link to the office of the president of South Africa and its funding by the government. Another key finding was that although the local debate around intellectual issues was generally in line with global trends, and reflected similar positions in the contestation about who is an “intellectual”, the role of the intellectual in society, and which position they should speak from, South Africa’s case was somewhat peculiar in the sense that definitions of intellectuals go beyond their capabilities, role and positions, into what race they are. The study concludes by acknowledging that the question of intellectual activity is considered significant and remains high on the South African media agenda, and extensive coverage is given to it, but that, drawing from the findings, certain South African intellectuals feel there is a need for an alternative public sphere (like the Native Club) other than the media. However, there seems to be no agreement on how an ideal public sphere would operate.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

1. CHAPTER 1
   1.1 Introduction..........................................................1
   1.2 Aim.............................................................................2
   1.3 Rationale.................................................................3

2. CHAPTER 2
   2.1. Theoretical Framework and Literature Review.............7
   2.2. The notion of the Public Sphere.................................8
   2.3. Intellectuals ..........................................................9
   2.4. Role of the Media....................................................13
      2.4.1 Agenda Setting....................................................14

3. CHAPTER 3
   3.1 Methodology.............................................................17
   3.2 Method of Collection................................................18
      3.2.1 Publication profiles.............................................21
   3.3 Method of Analysis....................................................23
   3.4 Strengths and Limitations of Method of Analysis..........24
   3.5 The Ensuing Debate..................................................25

4. CHAPTER 4
   4.1 Research Findings....................................................38
      4.1.1 Presentation of Data and Analysis.........................38
      4.1.2 Themes Addressed...............................................41

5. CHAPTER 5
   5.1. Conclusion..............................................................47
      5.1.1 SA Intellectual (re)defined?.................................47
      5.1.2 Role of SA Intellectual.........................................48
      5.1.3 Intellectual life a space apart...............................49
   5.2. Notion of the Public Sphere........................................50
      5.2.1 Role of the Media in Public deliberation...............50
      5.2.2 Native Club: A counter/alternative public sphere?.....51

6. References........................................................................52

7. Appendices