SHOPPING DURING A REVOLUTION: ENTREPRENEURS, RETAILERS AND 'WHITE' IDENTITY IN SOUTH AFRICA'S DEMOCRATIC TRANSITION

South Africa in the late 1980s and early 1990s: as barricades burned in the townships, and armoured vehicles rolled through their streets, whites poured endlessly into the shops and malls in an apparent frenzy of consumption. At first glance this picture provides a classic example for a Marcusian view of the modern consumer; emotionally deadened by the blandishments of mass culture, he or she becomes the apt subject of the authoritarian state.

But in this article I will suggest that something more complex that was happening. Ultimately, the shopping-obsessed hedonists of the 1980s proved unwilling to fight to the death for their racial privilege. This paper is part of an attempt to explain why white South Africans, despite the continuing influence of various forms of racial ideology, and despite their demonstrable indifference to much of the suffering around them, did in fact opt for change. And it seeks to do so in a way which links the behaviours of daily life with national politics, rejecting any simple distinction between micro- and macro- levels of social analysis. Consumerism and acceptance of political change were linked in complex ways. The new patterns of consumption, rather than stabilising support for the racial order, were bound up with new and more self-reflexive forms of self-identity which were not easily compatible with the state's abstract and unitary political projects. The argument of the paper therefore parallels that of recent sociologists of contemporary consumption who tend toward a less pessimistic view of shopping's social impact than has often been the case in the work of their predecessors.

The paper examines the world of consumption on the West Rand, an area just outside Johannesburg, during the South African democratic transition of 1985 to 1995. My route into this question is through a series of interviews with small business people. After outlining my overall argument, I will provide an overview of the way in which political struggles interacted with the world of retail and entrepreneurship. I will then proceed to focus on the experiences of shopkeepers and business people, showing how these illustrate my broader arguments.

Virtually all accounts of the South African transition would agree that it was the product of revolt led by the ANC and internal social movements, of external pressure in the form of sanctions, and of the policy shift to negotiation by the liberation movement under Mandela and the National Party (NP) under FW De Klerk (though analysts may disagree about the relative importance of each of these). But such macro-political factors by themselves fail to explain why the large majority of whites were prepared to acquiesce in change in the end. Throughout the 1990s there were substantial forces in white politics which did attempt to give leadership to white rejection of change. PW Botha's 'successful' repression in the 1980s demonstrated that the option of continued military control existed, albeit at the price of a wider war and economic decline. It was not inevitable that whites would do what the rest of the world thought of as sensible and capitulate. To say that it was in their interests to do so, begs the question of how they conceived of their interests. There is thus a real question as to why whites went along with political change."

There was an important shift in the subjectivity of white South Africans between the beginning of the 1970s and the beginning of the 1990s which made it more difficult to mobilise them effectively for the defence of the racial order. This new subjectivity was related to the wider global changes in self-identity associated with the era of late modernity. Forms of identity emerged which focused on 'lifestyle'. New patterns of consumption were a crucial driving force of this change. With an increasing tendency of whites to identify as globalised consumers, their ability to identify with the abstract cause of apartheid declined. Their self-identification became increasingly self-regarding and hedonistic.

This situation marked a change from the era of the 1960s when the state had some success in a modernist project of tightly regulating white society through surveillance of political, social and sexual conduct, cultural autarky through censorship, and military conscription. State initiatives helped to generate a subjectivity which was amenable to the defence of the modernist state project of a totalitarian racial order. In the next decades this subjectivity was eroded.

Vital to this breakdown was the social division which occurred in Afrikaner nationalism from around the end of the 1960s. In the 1950s and 1960s the NP had succeeded in imposing on Afrikaners a monolithic and almost hermetically sealed unity. In this era the National Party constructed a network which I refer to as the 'pseudo-traditional organisational complex'. The complex was a set of institutions aimed at keeping Afrikaners mobilised and separate from English speaking whites and foreign cultural influences. Increasingly, this complex was cross cut by tensions between the emerging middle class, professionals and business leadership on the one hand, and lower grade white collar employees, workers and agrarian nationalists on the other. Generally, the former began to accept limited changes in the structure of apartheid while the latter resisted them. But even more important from our point of view here, these initially relatively minor political differences fragmented the unity of the NP. The result was a clear decline in the cohesiveness of Afrikaner identity and in the mobilisational capacity of the pseudo-traditional organisational complex. Especially the more affluent strata began looking outward, which enabled an interaction between the new global processes of subjectivity formation and local ones. A 'strong' Afrikaner identity combining allegiance to volk and state was increasingly replaced by a 'residual' Afrikaner identity, comprising an emotional attachment to language and informal social and business networks.
The rise of a consumerist identity did not of course mean that whites were automatically going to become more racially egalitarian. But a strongly individualised sense of self-interest was likely to come into play in making political decisions. Therefore, when in the 1980s political pressures on white South Africa became severe, the priority for large swathes of that society was not the pursuit of racial ideology, but the possibility of continuing to pursue 'lifestyle'. This outlook was not conducive to military sacrifice, and encouraged calculations about accepting a new order in which property rights would be guaranteed.

The need to change propelled whites into constructing new narratives of the self. This self was characteristically defined in terms of a certain style of consumption, which people of varying socio-economic positions would label as 'middle class'. A notion of 'middle class-ness' was deployed by people brought up within the confines of racial ideology to negotiate the road to desegregation. Racial boundaries began to blur, and commitment to racial ideologies weakened. The typical pattern which emerged in my interviews was one of claims to have never been personally racist in the past, combined with a declared willingness to accept integration with the black 'middle class'. The focus of social fear shifted from race as such to questions of social stratification. The more affluent or more change-minded strata of whites wanted desegregation to be managed in a way that would unify the 'middle class' across racial boundaries while preventing the black poor from entering formerly 'white' schools and housing areas in large numbers.

Globalised media played an enormous role in the process of white self-identification. There was in the re-narrativization of self that whites embarked on, a strong sense of talking outward, addressing a global audience whose criticisms of them even the state broadcaster had been unable to suppress. The notion of 'middle class-ness' drew on television images of American suburbia and consumer styles. Desegregation was imagined through television treatments of it.

The importance of the shopping and entertainment in white daily life became enormous. It was in this sphere that white society was increasingly invested. Defence of 'lifestyle' came to be seen as separable from defence of the racial order, and more important than it.

Shopping in Revolutionary Krugersdorp

To the East and West of Johannesburg, a continuous strip of industrial towns follows the Reef, the accessible strip of gold bearing ore near the surface. This is 'The Rand'. The mines around which these towns were originally constructed at the end of the nineteenth century are in decline, and the industries which have built around them struggle to survive globalised competition. During the 1980s and 1990s the West Rand was at the centre of the battle for the future of South Africa. The divisions of the society were built into its physical structure in remarkably clear way. Spinal roads linked a chain of town centres, designated as 'white' areas under apartheid. Moving west, Roodepoort is the nearest to Johannesburg; then comes Krugersdorp, and then Randfontien. Roodepoort was by far the most modern and prosperous of these towns; it had extensive new cluster housing developments and prosperous suburbs. There were some important social disparities within the formerly 'white' towns. Some parts of Roodepoort, and to a much greater extent Krugersdorp and Randfontein, were marked by the presence of visible 'poor white' areas. Krugersdorp has a clear physical division between affluent Noordheuwel and working class West Krugersdorp, the latter characterised by grim face brick housing and evident unemployment.

But far greater disparities were to be found in contrasting the central towns with the string of African townships which apartheid planning generated as a separate chain of housing beyond the white suburbs. These were overcrowded and lacking in basic facilities. For the purposes of this paper, the most important of them was Kagiso, south of Krugersdorp and the home of much of its workforce. By the late 1980s the combination of township housing shortages and declining enforcement of apartheid had enabled homeless people to establish squatter camps in some of the empty peripheral spaces around the white suburbs.

Inside this configuration there was a specific shape to the world of retailing. The old urban centres in Krugersdorp, and several parts of Roodepoort, had the clusters of chain stores, small general stores, hardware shops, and green grocers characteristic of small South African towns. Many of the successful businesses were operated by individuals from specific ethnic backgrounds; Indians (mainly Moslems descended from Gujerati-speaking immigrants), Greeks, Portuguese and some Italians. Historically, the Jewish community had played a large part in retail in the town, but this role had declined because of upward social mobility and movement out of the area. As we shall see, the contribution of Afrikaners and the generality of white English speakers to entrepreneurship in the area was much more patchy than those of the smaller ethnic minorities.

The pattern of localised shopping had been disrupted, although not totally displaced in the 1980s, with the construction of Westgate, a vast, post-modern shopping mall on the Roodepoort boundary with Krugersdorp. The mall transformed consumption patterns in the area, drawing shoppers on a big scale from the white towns and increasingly, the black townships of the whole West Rand. It presented shoppers with a panoply of consumption opportunities, in contrast to the rather basic range of goods in the Krugersdorp shops. There were lavishly stocked prestige stores, speciality shops, cinemas, restaurants, and fast food outlets. The challenge of Westgate put the smaller businesses of the area under pressure and those which survived tended to be the ones able to offer extra services, convenience, good pricing or exceptional quality. Often these survivors were again, businesses run by minorities with considerable accumulated business experience.
Indian traders had been formally excluded from the central business area of Krugersdorp at the height of apartheid, but some had found legal expedients to get around this restriction. With the crumbling of much 'petty' apartheid legislation in the 1980s they were able to regularise their position. But few African entrepreneurs could break into the trade of the town centre, because of both the lack of capital and connections, and the racist atmosphere of the town. Township business centred on small shops and street trading. The conservative Krugersdorp council strove to keep a rising tide of street traders out of the town centre, but by the early 1990s, this was a lost battle. The most visible sign of African entrepreneurship in the centre was the minibus taxi industry, which by the 1990s was burgeoning and generating considerable returns. The difference in the spatial situation of black and white business was to have important consequences.

In the latter half of 1985, township organisations launched boycotts of shops. This was part of the quasi-revolutionary uprising which swept through the Southern Transvaal, involving extensive street clashes between youths and security forces. The aim of the boycotts was put economic pressure on the national and local state, in pursuance of a wide variety of political and economic demands. In Krugersdorp youth organisations made agreements with African retailers and taxi owners that they would be exempt from the boycott in exchange for lowered prices. These events commenced a series of boycotts which flared up at moments of local or national crisis, over the next ten years. Tensions were exacerbated when the National Party lost control of Krugersdorp municipal council to the extreme right in 1988. Although, within a year, the dominant faction on the council backed down from its attempts to maintain a fully segregationist policy, its behaviour certainly exacerbated local aspects of the conflict.

This situation created a complex set of tensions. African retailers had an interest in maintaining boycotts of all other businesses, but not in accepting price reductions. White entrepreneurs for the most part suffered serious declines in takings during the boycotts. They saw the hard line reactionary Krugersdorp council as a key problem. Almost unanimously, whites in small business fulminated against the role of the council. Even before the extreme rightist take over, the council's ineptitude had lost the town the chance to have Westgate built within its boundaries. They council had also, their critics claimed, lost opportunities for the establishment of a car factory, a minor airport and a university campus in the town. By the early 1990s, white business people in Krugersdorp were desperate to cut a deal with black political organisations, to prevent the destruction of the local economy by boycott.

The Indian business community were in an important, though uncomfortable, hinge situation in this conflict. The ANC had a political project of creating African and Indian unity. Moreover as the transition picked up speed in the 1990s, established Indian business people were often well placed to manoeuvre white business into the kinds of alliances which the ANC wished to create. The record of Moslem participation in ANC politics gave some Indian business people credibility with African organisations, while their significant local economic status gave them credibility with white business. Yet the interests of African and Indian entrepreneurs could be, and often were, defined as clashing with one another.

In 1986 a local African business body was formed, the Kagiso African Chamber of Commerce (KAFcoc). Many Indian businessmen joined it, on the basis of an agreement that there would be cooperation between African business organisations and the Indian community. When the transition opened in the early 1990s, a boycott broke out over charges for services in the townships. Despite the Indian businesses support for KAFcoc, KAFcoc's leaders did not consult them and included Indian shops in the businesses to be boycotted. This outbreak of tension between African and Indian business interests was only overcome after the Indian community provided shelter for refugees fleeing a Zulu nationalist attack on ANC supporters at the Swannieville squatter camp. Following the positive response in the townships to this action, Indian businesses were exempted from the boycott. A subsequent boycott in response to the 1993 assassination of Communist Party leader Chris Hani was much better managed. A high level ANC delegation held talks with the various organisations, creating a front embracing both Indian and African businesses. The prospect of being exempted from the boycott on an individual basis was held out to white businesses on condition they aligned themselves with the democratic movement. Eventually most white business came into an agreement to pressure the council for change. The ANC thus effectively managed to draw most of local business into an alliance by the time of the 1994 election.

The political pressures to which Krugersdorp whites were subjected were crucial in bringing about change. But as I argued above, these pressures do not in themselves fully account for why change rather than repression was accepted as the option. Krugersdorp was after all a town in which right wing organisations were very active in proposing repressive political 'solutions'. The willingness of the town's white businesses, and eventually, of most of its white voters to accept participation in the new system needs to be accounted for. The forces symbolised by Westgate - the spread of a new kind of consumerist identity - were crucial in eroding the very clear boundaries of racial and ethnic identity which had hitherto prevailed amongst whites on the West Rand, creating the subjective basis for a political shift. The individual case studies which follow aim to provide some insights into how this process played out in the world of the small businessperson and the white consumer.

Dave: The Incompetence of Whiteness

Extraordinary attitudinal problems amongst white small business owners were identified by Dave, an expert on small business development who was associated with the Roodepoort chamber of Commerce. Dave argued that entrepreneurs were chronically unable to take a long-term view of their situation:

"So many entrepreneurs say to me that the only thing they believe in is, that in a business you've got to make money. And in that process all they do is to chase turnover, and they spend so much bloody time chasing turnover that at the end of the line, behind them the walls are falling down".

Dave had found that many entrepreneurs were unable to present adequate business plans, monitor their cash flows or plan financially.

What emerges from Dave's characterisation of the entrepreneurs is how far they were driven by a self-identity as consumers rather than by seeing themselves as producers or creators. Business was conceived of by many entrepreneurs as subsidising their hedonistic life styles rather than as being an activity of any intrinsic worth. Business owners failed to appreciate the necessity for hands-on management. Dave had found that owners were frequently absent from their businesses:

"It's golf on Mondays, Tuesday golf, Wednesday lunch and golf, on Thursday it's only golf in the afternoon, Friday it's probably golf all day and who the hell does any business on Saturday anyway? People are simply not in their businesses".

Initial success was often spoiled by entrepreneurs who were splashed out on things that they couldn't afford, notably luxury cars. In Dave's view a typical pattern would be that after a successful first 18 months, the owner would let down his guard, and the business would then lose direction and collapse.

Dave's account evokes very well the consumption oriented ethos of the white middle class. This desire for instant gratification may have been further encouraged by the short term personal horizons that the background of chronic political instability fostered. Amongst many whites, there was an expectation of high rewards for limited effort.

Karen: Ambiguities of New South Africanism
Karen is representative of the more successful end of the spectrum of small Afrikaner entrepreneurs and of the more reformist trends within Afrikaner self-identity. She and her husband Jan, a Netherlander, had run a bakery in Krugersdorp for 18 years (with one interval). The longevity and success of the business was based on its convenient suburban location and the good quality of its products. By buying there, suburbanites could save themselves a trip to Westgate. The chain stores could not compete on quality. Karen and Jan had been alarmed when a supermarket had opened a bakery section, selling at lower prices, but Karen and Jan's sales had not fallen off because the marked superiority of their products gave them a niche in the market place. The small African workforce was bound to the couple by close paternalist relations. Two of their employees had been on the staff since the first year of the shop's operation. No employee had ever gone on strike or participated in a strike, Karen claimed. To get around work boycotts in the townships, they had independently made arrangements with Karen's domestic employee to share her accommodation, so as to be able to avoid having to pass pickets. An odd unintended consequence of the boycotts had actually been to boost Karen's business. Because of the position of the shop in the suburbs, it was not monitored by boycott supporters as shops in the town centre tended to be. As a result many black shoppers who feared to be seen shopping would go to Karen for their bread at such times.

Karen's religious history exemplified the loosening of the grip of the pseudo-traditional organisations over daily life. She had been raised at the centre of the complex, in the Dutch Reformed Church. Jan was Catholic, and when their son was born, Karen's DRC minister had given Jan 'hassles' over the child's religious future. This led Karen to decide to convert to Catholicism. She and her husband had to be married again under the Catholic rite, their children had to be re-baptised, and Karen had to be confirmed again. After eight years in the Catholic church, Karen and her children rejoined the DRC, but her daughter then moved to a Methodist congregation. While this suggests the continued pull on Karen's allegiances to the DRC, her attitude to the church was a disillusioned one: "I still don't mind going to the Dutch Reformed Church. I just feel that here where we are it is very stodgy." She preferred to attend a DRC congregation in another area which had relaxed 'carefree' attitude and was influenced by charismatic ideas: "to me they're not Dutch Reformed any more. They've totally changed." In this way Karen was typical of the loss of faith in the pseudo-traditional organisations. Similarly, her children had become disaffected from the Voortrekkers, the Afrikaner youth organisation: "...they didn't enjoy it. It was too Afrikaans for them. Because I have very liberal children and they don't fit in with the AWB [i.e.
Karen defined herself as a 'liberal'. What she appeared to mean by this was that she was sceptical of the prevailing political and racial ideologies within the Afrikaans speaking community, and in favour of deracialization of institutions. She claimed never to have voted before the 1994 election because of her political disaffection. However, she also had reservations over the pace of change. And in fact when the transition occurred, she had opted for the party which seemed most able to exercise white control over the speed of it, voting for FW De Klerk's NP:

"I desperately wanted a change, but I also felt that it couldn't happen overnight... deep inside you were scared, scared of what would happen when the change came..."

Karen's attitudes to desegregation were fairly typical of those of the 'liberal' end of the white middle class. She had no objection to integration, but wanted middle class white schools to remain middle class. Thus racial integration had to be introduced gradually from primary school, because, she claimed, only in this way could 'standards' be maintained.

Karen was highly judgemental of the overt racism of poor whites, but also herself fearful of black people as a collectivity. Her son Stefan went to a predominantly white working class technical school. She portrayed her son as the product of an uplifting middle class background, distinguished from his racist proletarian school fellows by both his liberal attitudes. The kids at Jim Fouche Technical School Karen said would:

"... kill a black if a black was taken in there. But most of the kids are from Krugersdorp West... Stefan has never mixed with those kids. He says you walk, you keep your eyes front, that's it."

Stefan's 'one or two' friends were from middle class Noordheuwel.

Like many liberal Afrikaans speakers, Karen, while having distanced herself from the pseudo-traditional complex of Afrikaner organization, had in the post-election period experienced a revival of ethno-linguistic identification triggered by the state broadcaster's reduction of its Afrikaans transmissions. This was widely seen by people like Karen as an attack on their language, and a breach of the reciprocity inherent in the transitional arrangements:

"... with television, they are wanting to take Afrikaans off, you know going for Afrikaans and that kind of thing. I never realised it would worry me and it does. It worries me in the way that I realize it's a heritage I have ... I haven't been a staunch Afrikaner but it has been there... It's not politics, it's an identity, which to me is part of my family ..."

Karen's career demonstrates the emergence of a sector of small business targeted at the newly expanded white middle class. It was, because of its small size and suburban location, relatively insulated from surrounding political turmoil. An interesting paradox is that Jan and Karen are able to import a labour relations system arising from colonial paternalism into a somewhat late modern business organisation. Karen's positions were almost paradigmatic of those of liberal or reformist Afrikaners interviewed in this study. Karen's self-identity is based on globalised discourses of consumption, codified in terms of middle class-ness. This strong middle class identity enabled Karen to embrace the idea of a desegregated South African middle class. She was happy to embrace this notion as the price of keeping the masses at bay. Karen had no sense of obligation to poorer whites and was keen to distance herself from them in order to strengthen her middle class status. Her rejection of established notions of Afrikaner identity and her disenchantment with the world of pseudo-traditional organisations was made very clear.

It is interesting that it was the question of Afrikaans on television which precipitated Karen's 'residual' sense of Afrikaner identity. Her ideological world was rooted in globalised media representations, but she wanted some representation of her ethnicity within that framework.

George: Diasporic Businessman On the Front Line

George, a third generation South African of Greek descent, was the owner-manager of one of Krugersdorf's best known restaurants. When interviewed in 1995, George was positive about political change but at the same time felt squeezed between the resentment he had experienced in the past from Afrikaners and what he regarded as growing black antagonism to his community. Speaking of the response his immigrant grandparents had experienced from Afrikaners he said:

"And of course hulle was die donderse uitlanders [they were the damn foreigners], And that filtered right through to the third generation..."
George continued to experience occasional incidents of this sort:

"I've been told that the 'Grieke is net wit kaffers' [Greeks are just white kaffirs] by ... a drunk white Afrikaans customer. Of course he just got kicked out ... you do get ... the owner of the restaurant being called Griekie [little Greek] and that kind of thing, which does irritate one, but for business' sake I think one just swallows it ... there is a certain amount of a condescending attitude."

Now it was violent robberies in shops, which George saw in racial terms, which were making Greek shop owners anxious about their future. He felt that the Greek community was particularly exposed to criminal violence because of their high concentration in vulnerable small businesses:

"We are shop kind of people, we are in cash businesses ... people don't realise how worried we are about it. We've seen not one, not two, but in the thirties and forties of different incidents of young kids getting gunned down when they close their Steers [steak houses]."

In addition he feared the anti-Greek sentiments expressed during a recent strike against the SPAR chain of stores. A number of SPAR franchise holders were of Greek origin, and the strike had taken a xenophobic turn which included the trashing by strikers of the Greek consulate: "For some obscure reason there are banners saying 'Go Back to Greece ...'."

George had both benefitted from, and helped to create more complex patterns of consumption amongst the Afrikaner middle class of the area. Under its previous owner, the restaurant which he ran had been only one of a handful of major restaurants on the West Rand. When Westgate had opened up, featuring about fifteen restaurants and entertainment venues, the restaurant, then a steak house, had been badly hit by the competition and George had bought it. George developed the business as a speciality Greek restaurant. Initially there had been a certain amount of consumer resistance:

"I can't say it was a booming business from day one, purely because people were sceptical, there's 'n Griekse soort kos [a Greek kind of food] and 'n Griekse soort [a Greek kind of] attitude and I think that it phased people slightly."

But George had in fact hit the consumer market at exactly the point at which its tastes were changing:

"I've had the most incredible response from the Afrikaans people in Krugersdorp. It's something new, it's something different, and they're quite open and receptive to a new way of looking at things, which I'm very, very impressed with."

It is interesting here that George's language starts to slide away from the culinary and toward the political. For in fact the 'openness' and receptivity to 'a new way of looking at things' which apparently characterised the political transition was precisely bound up with the movement of the Afrikaner middle class away from the world of pseudo-traditionalism and into a self-identification as part of a world of globalised consumers. The desire to participate in global patterns of consumption was conducive to a greater degree of political adaptability. In the restaurant the process of changing consumption and the rise of class based desegregationism had run alongside one another. Explaining how customers had accepted the racial desegregation of his restaurant, George attributed this to class factors: "It also reflects on the kind of clientele that I have. I don't know how it would go down at your local franchised steak house."
However, the response from George to the difficulties of the outside world had been withdrawal into the Greek community:

"We have one of the most successful Greek communities in South Africa, in terms of what we offer to our members, in terms of our growth. We have a full Greek school, primary and high school... The community here is centred around the church, purely because we are the only Greek church on the West Rand. [And] because of the past hostility of other whites..."

Yet the process of self-definition was complex, for the Greek community in South Africa had a specific historical experience. As George discussed this with his friend Nicos, the question became ever more tangled:

Nicos: "The South African Greek is extremely, extremely loyal to this country. And I don't know of many Greeks that have said they want to leave the country. They feel they must leave the country, sure, but they have got a really, really strong allegiance to this country, because it's given them what they have."

George: "Also, our generation of people, we're South Africans, we are not Greek. You know we go to Greece, and we love it but we're... {trails off} we're different."

Nicos: "But you're not accepted here as a South African, by any means."

George: "You're basically an immigrant everywhere."

Nicos: "You're not a Greek over there either, but I do believe they'll accept you because you are a Greek in essence. No here, you are not a South African... you are not allowed to be one."

The long-term success of George's business indicates the increasingly complex consumer demands of the Afrikaans speaking middle strata. As his story suggests those strata became more flexible on the political front, not so much as a straightforward response to pressure, but as part of a strategy in which participation in the patterns of late modern consumption came to override every other consideration.
As part of a diasporic minority within the dominant white 'racial' group, George found himself in a complex situation. Long standing commercial skills inside his community could be turned into very effective economic interventions. But his very success put him in the social crossfire. Afrikaner hostility had kept him socially marginalised in the past, although it was now diminishing. Spiralling crime and unresolved racial antagonisms made George fear for his future. As a consequence, he located himself very firmly within the Greek community and was contemplating emigration. Yet his social marginalisation was far from total, and thus he was posed with problems as to how far his identity was South African.

End of the Rainbow?
To what extent had the commercial world of Krugersdorp changed? Ebrahim, a successful local Indian businessman who had been active in pro-ANC political organisations, was very optimistic about developments within white Krugersdorp:

"The real Evil-Kinevils (sic) were a small percentage. I'm still convinced that the majority of Afrikaners have thrown in the towel and accepted that they must live with the people. Because you can see that there is a changing attitude in Krugersdorp... Krugersdorp was very racialistic. Today it is not."

Ebrahim thought that white support for such a shift was strong, although it was stronger amongst the young than the old, and stronger amongst the middle class than the working class. He even felt the local police had shown they were willing to confront right wingers.
Karen was far more pessimistic. Although genuinely pleased about political change, she saw race relations in Krugersdorp as worse than before and deteriorating. She thought that the right wingers, whom she identified with the white working class of Krugersdorp West, were more cautious than before the 1994 elections but more enraged beneath the surface:

"I think they might think before they do anything where before they may just have acted ... But I actually think there's more hatred, which I never would have believed possible."

The picture is clearly a mixed one. There does seem to have been a reduction in street level racist incidents in Krugersdorp. At the same time Ebrahim’s status as a respected businessman does means that he experiences the town in a different way than do the African poor. Karen’s conclusions are also a little problematic. There was a broad relation between white right wing support and lower incomes, but not a perfect one: there were wealthy right wingers, and their were white low income earners who were genuinely trying to come to terms with the new social order. And even if whites’ retreat from overt confrontation was as unwilling as Karen suggests, it would have still made some practical difference to daily life.

Political resistance and pressure provided the motive force for whites to reassess their future. But the decisions they took in response to those pressures were rooted in shifts in subjectivity. And these shifts were not a purely local phenomenon, but need to be understood in terms of the relation between South Africa and the wider world of late modernity.
1. A comment is needed on the use of apartheid 'racial' categories in this paper. Use of these categories by the author reflects that under apartheid, legal definitions of race - 'White', 'Coloured', 'Indian', 'African', etc., had a reality derived from the very different access to resources which people in each of these categories possessed, the different levels of coercion to which they were subjected, the forms of spatial segregation which were imposed on them, and the significantly differentiated forms of political organisation which consequently emerged amongst them. But the categories were of course thoroughly artificial. It took immense ideological and bureaucratic labours for instance, for one part of the population to be defined as 'white'. One of the paper's underlying assumptions is that racial categories are subject to constant disintegration and attempts at recomposition.

2. For example, Robert Bocock, Consumption (London, Routledge, 1993).

3. The interviews quoted in this paper were carried out by Candice Harrison in Roodepoort and Krugersdorp, between 1993 and 1995. The comments by 'Dave' were recorded by the author at a Roodepoort Chamber of Commerce public seminar in 1993.

6. Anthony Marx, "Apartheid's End: South Africa's Transition From Racial Domination", Ethnic and Racial Studies, vol. 20, no.3, July 1997, pp.470-496, argues that in the period leading to the transition, whites attained unity amongst themselves, thus creating an essential precondition for change. I find this proposition implausible; by 1994 whites were probably more spread out along an ideological and organisational spectrum than at any time in the country's history.

7. The argument of the paper has been stimulated by the thinking represented in Ulrich Beck, Anthony Giddens and Scott Lash, Reflexive Modernization: Politics, Tradition and Aesthetics in the Modern Social Order (Cambridge, Polity, 1995), and Martin Albrow, The Global Age (Cambridge, Polity, 1996).

11. Vincent Crapanzano, Waiting: The Whites of South Africa (New York, Random House, 1985), did a superb job of identifying the forces of stasis in white subjectivity, but failed to identify the factors making for their incipient erosion.

12. In contrast to my argument, Gerhart Schutte, What Racists Believe (Sage, Thousand Oaks, 1995), contends that during the transition whites in fact unified around a common racist ideology, which apparent political differences only appeared to cover. Schutte would surely be hard put to explain why ideological divergences and conflicts amongst whites, up to and including the point of killing each other, were so intense. And indeed, can his argument explain why there was a transition at all? If whites were so unified around the question of racial domination, why were they not able to develop an effective strategy to retain political power?
