

https://dspace.org/

Unintended Artistic Research on Memory, Masculinity, and African Beauty: The Case of Serurubele

Shoro, Katleho Kano

2020-07

Arts Research Africa, The Wits School of Arts, University of the Witwatersrand

https://hdl.handle.net/10539/29219

What does it mean to re-evaluate ideas of beauty in Africa? Using performance as a research methodology and the idea of serurubele (“butterfly” in Sesotho and Setswana) as a heuristic device, this performance-lecture explored the value that critically engaging with people’s relationships with butterflies, butterfly-games, songs, and memories holds in the context of decolonial, African-centred scholarship. Could interrogating the idea of butterflies, as well as the tenderness that comes with black African men’s memories of butterflies, offer a more nuanced perspective of black masculinity and gender identity?

Downloaded from a DSpace repository. https://dspace.org/

DOI: https://doi.org/10.17605/OSF.IO/TS85Y

PERFORMANCE-LECTURE

UNINTENDED ARTISTIC RESEARCH ON MEMORY, MASCULINITY, AND AFRICAN BEAUTY: THE CASE OF SERURUBELE

KATLEHO KANO SHORO

This article is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International (CC BY 4.0) licence:
https://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0

What does it mean to re-evaluate ideas of beauty in Africa? Using performance as a research methodology and the idea of serurubele ("butterfly" in Sesotho and Setswana) as a heuristic device, this performance-lecture explored the value that critically engaging with people's relationships with butterflies, butterfly-games, songs, and memories holds in the context of decolonial, African-centred scholarship. Could interrogating the idea of butterflies, as well as the tenderness that comes with black African men's memories of butterflies, offer a more nuanced perspective of black masculinity and gender identity?

Katleho is a South African-based performance poet, author, and independent research consultant with an MA in Social Anthropology; katlehokano@gmail.com