viii Frühlingsfeier, op.56 no.5, bars 6-13

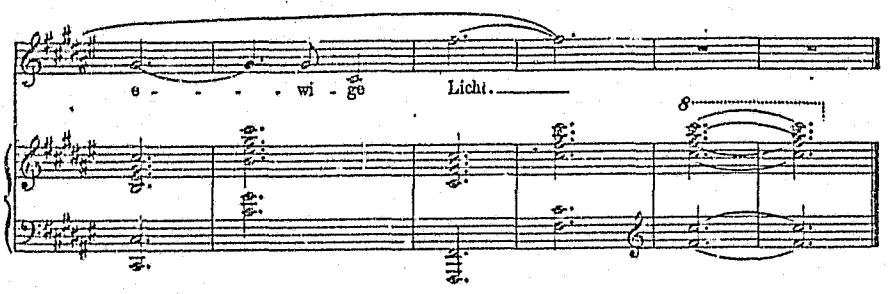
This poem by Heinrich Heine expresses the ecstasy of the pagan feast of Adonis in which the beautiful youth's death is celebrated. Strauss's setting consequently strives to be as uninhibited as the ritual taking place. This is achieved as much by the free use of dissonance - as in bars 10 and 11 - as by the demisemiquaver movement.

6.2 Melody

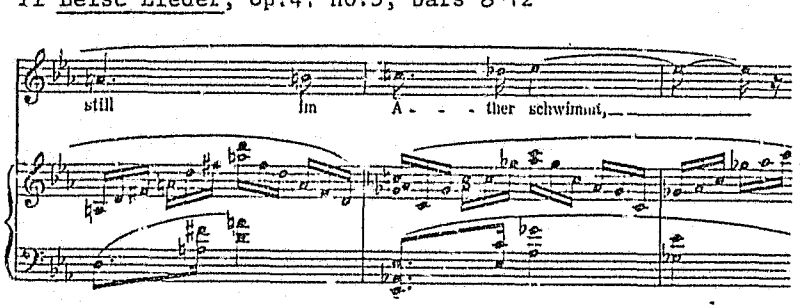
As in all the previous songs, Strauss continues to use a characteristic melodic line for key-words, the most prominent continuing to be Licht, Himmel, Liebe and Seele, and associated words. The examples which follow represent a selection from this last group of songs. They have been chosen because they require little or no elucidation in the light of the comments made previously regarding the treatment, and because the text clearly indicates the context in which the key-word appears.

6.2.1 Treatment of "Licht", "Himmel" and associated concepts

i Am Ufer, op.41 no.3, bars 49-54

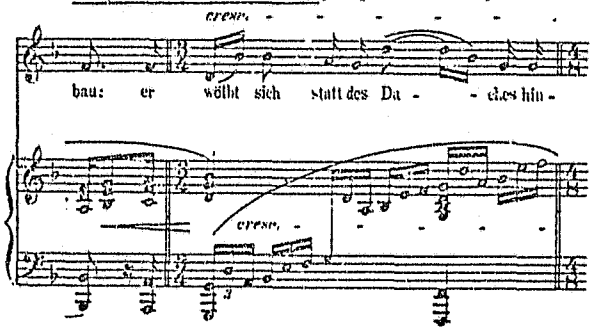


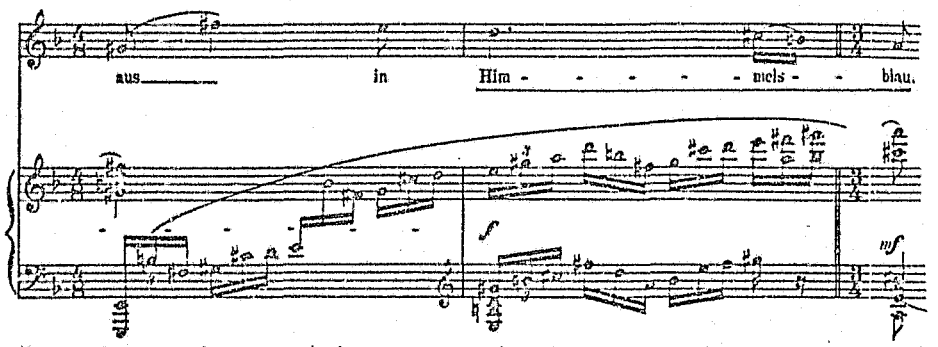
ii Leise Lieder, op.41 no.5, bars 8-12[2]



Note that Äther here replaces Himmel.

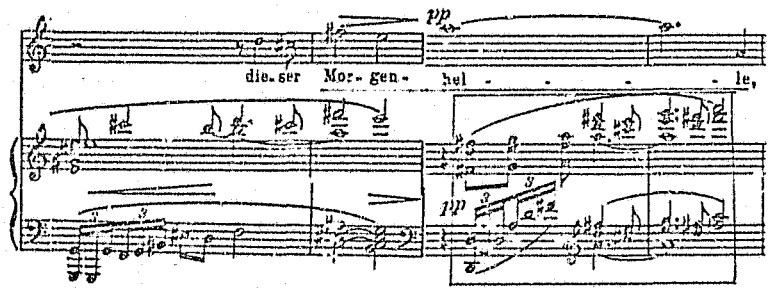
iii Die Ulme zu Hirsau, op.41 no.3, bars 13[2]-17[1]



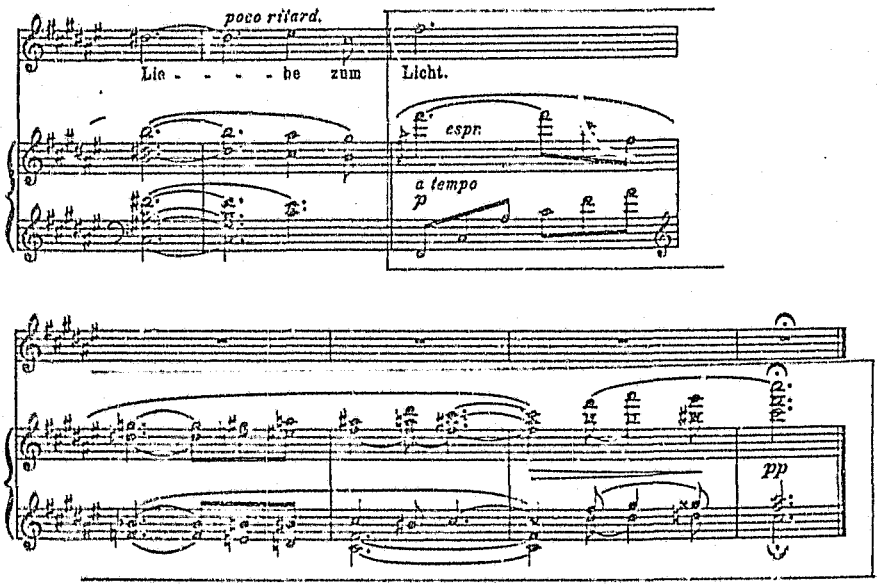


Note the continuous rising pattern in the accompaniment against the descending melodic line.

iv Auf ein Kind, op.47 no.1, bars 14-17



v Wiegenliedchen, op.49 no.3, bars 45-51



vi Wer lieben will, muss leiden, op.49 no.7, bars 34-40

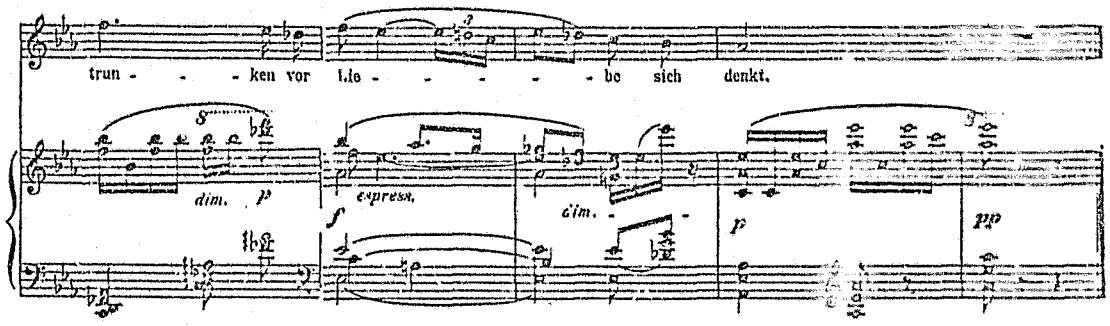
vii Further examples of the setting of these words may be found in:

Wiegenlied, op.41 no.1, bars 78^3-81^1
Notturno, op.44 no.1, bars 94-97^1
Morgenrot, op.46 no.4, bars 55^4-59^1
Des Dichters Abendgang, op.47 no.2, bars 31-34
Rückleben, op.47 no.3, bars 71^2-75
Winterweihe, op.48 no.4, bars 8-10^3
Winterliebe, op.48 no.5, bars 10-12^3
In goldener Fülle, op.49 no.2, bars 50^2-54^1
Blindenklage, op.56 no.2, bars 46-48^3

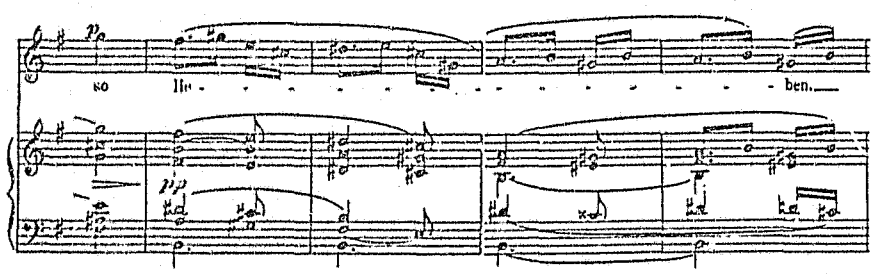
6.2.2 Treatment of "Liebe"

In all the examples which follow, Liebe is set melismatically. It is interesting to note that in the majority of cases, the word is still approached by leap, after which the melodic line descends. Strauss's basic technique had thus not changed, despite the extension of the melodic line.

i An Sie, op.43 no.1, bars 62-66

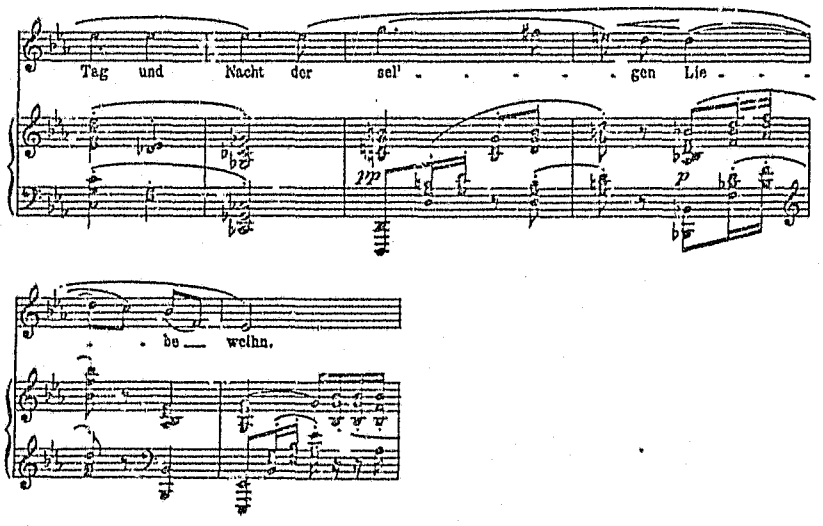


ii Mutt.rtändelei, op.43 no.2, bars 71^2-75



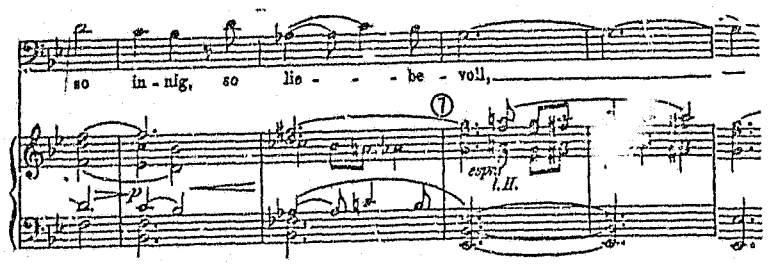
iii Ich sehe wie in einem Spiegel, op.46 no.5, bars 32 -33^3

iv Winterweihe, op.48 no.4, bars 29-34



v Junggesellenschwur, op.49 no.6, bars 9-11[3]

vi Das Thal, op.51 no.1, bars 84-89[1]

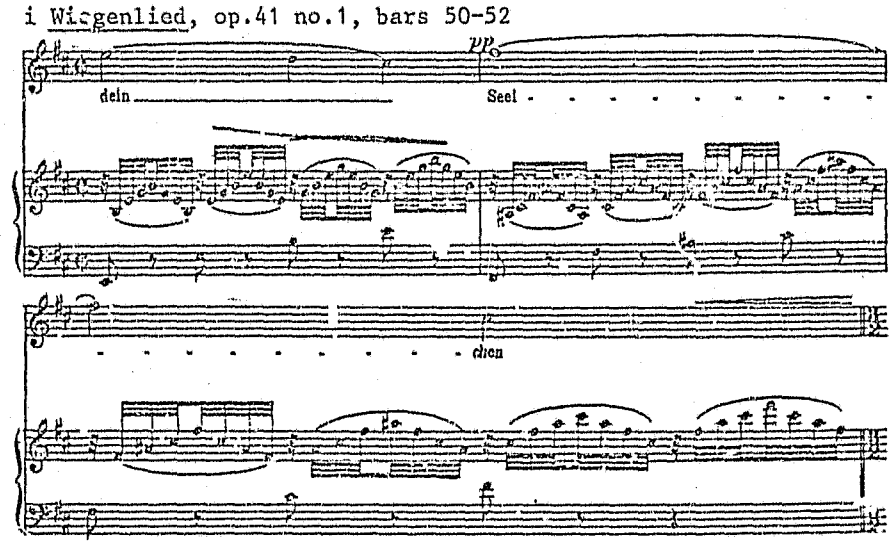


vii Further examples, in which Liebe is not treated melismatically but follows its previous pattern are to be found in:

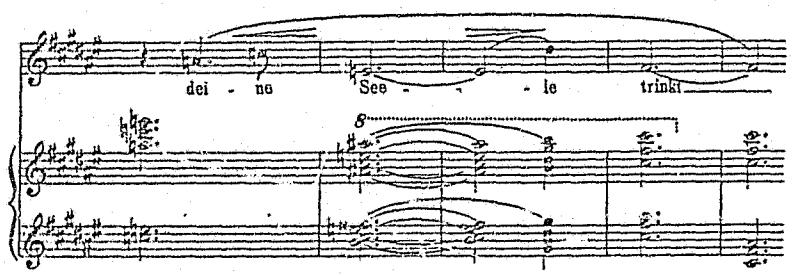
Notturno, op.44 no.1, bars 88-91[3]
Nächtlicher Gang, op.44 no.2, bars 35-38
Ich schwebe, op.48 no.2, bars 19-23
Winterliebe, op.48 no.5, bars 19-20[2]
Der Einsame, op.51 no.2, bars 13-18[1]

6.2.3 Treatment of "Seele"

i Wiegenlied, op.41 no.1, bars 50-52



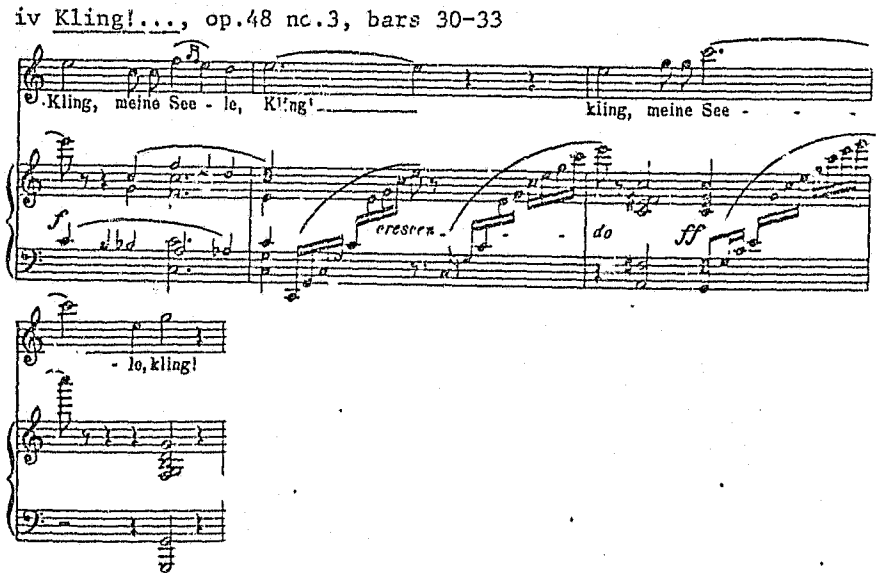
ii Am Ufer, op.41 no.3, bars 44-48[2]



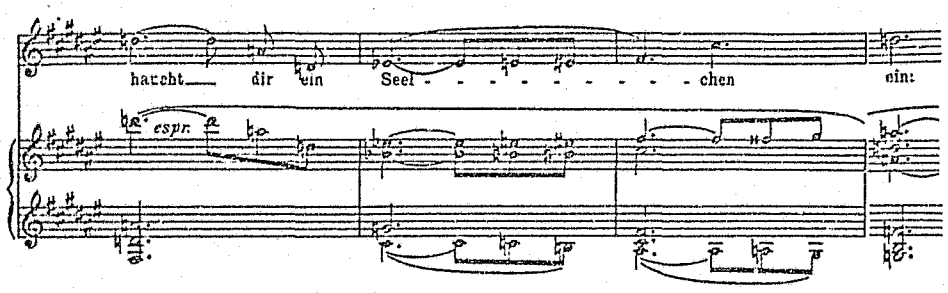
iii Leise Lieder, op.41 no.5, bars 36[3]-41

Note that this example embodies two poetic images, since the concept of eternity (ewige) is expressed by the rising figure in the accompaniment (bars 40 and 41).

iv Kling!..., op.48 no.3, bars 30-33



v Wiegenliedchen, op.49 no.3, bars 41-44[1]



This example is exceptional, firstly because the melodic line ascends, and secondly because Seelchen is treated melismatically.

vi Further examples may be found in:

An Sie, op.43 no.1, bars 56-57

In goldener Fülle, op.49 no.2, bars 30[2]-33[1]

6.2.4 Treatment of "Jubel"

Only two instances of this word occur in these songs. In both cases, the melody does not express the poetic idea (as occurred in the earlier examples). The expression of joy is conveyed entirely by the flourish in the accompaniment.

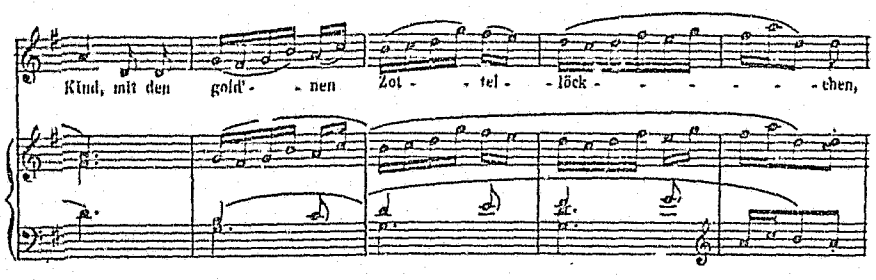
i Notturno, op.44 no.1, bars 151[3]-154[1]

ii Blindenklage, op.56 no.2, bars 8-10

6.2.5 Use of florid melodic figures

Florid melodic figures are used freely in these songs to various purposes. These become apparent within the context of the song, so that generalizations are no longer possible. This type of figure may thus be regarded as one of Strauss's stylistic characteristics. The following examples are self-explanatory, and represent a selection from the songs under discussion.

i Muttertändelei, op.43 no.2, bars 4-8

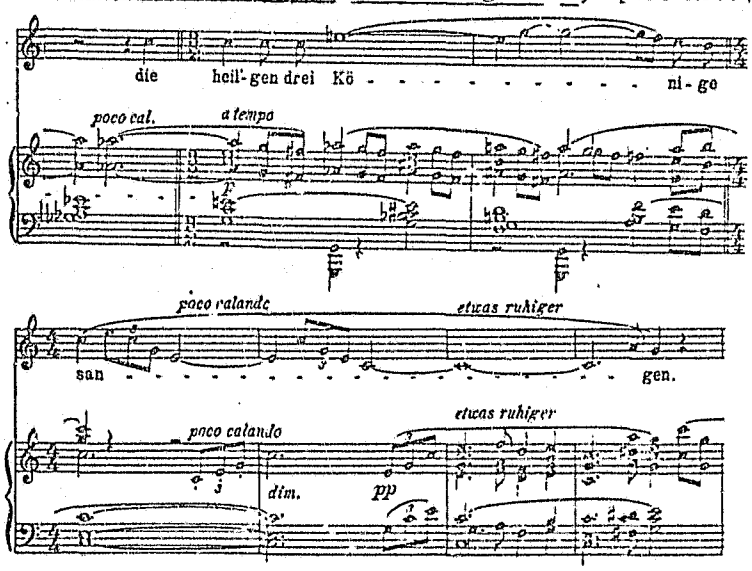


ii Gestern war ich Atlas, op.46 no.2, bars 6^{4}-12^{3}

iii Auf ein Kind, op.47 no.1, bars $18-25^3$

iv Winterliebe, op.48 no.5, bars 29^4-34^3

v Die heiligen drei Könige aus Morgenland, op.56 no.6, bars 61-67



vi Further examples may be found in:

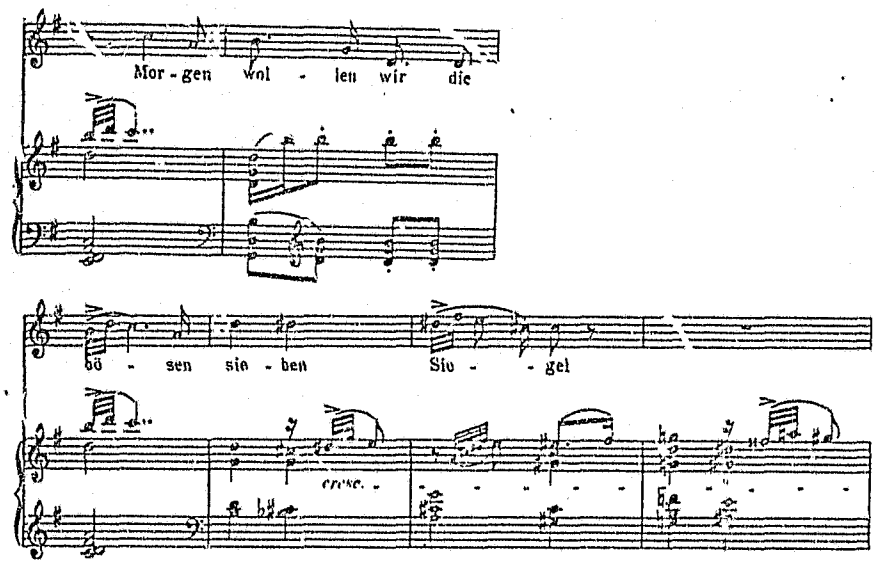
In der Campagna, op.41 no.2, bars 12^{2}-14
Die Ulme zu Hirsau, op.43 no.3, bars 75^{4}-77^{3}
Ein Obdach gegen Sturm und Regen, op.46 no.1, bars 43-49
Einkehr, op.47 no.4, bars 3-5^{1}
Sie wissen's nicht, op.49 no.5, bars 0^{4}-2
Mit deinen blauen Augen, op.56 no.4, bars 15^{4}-22

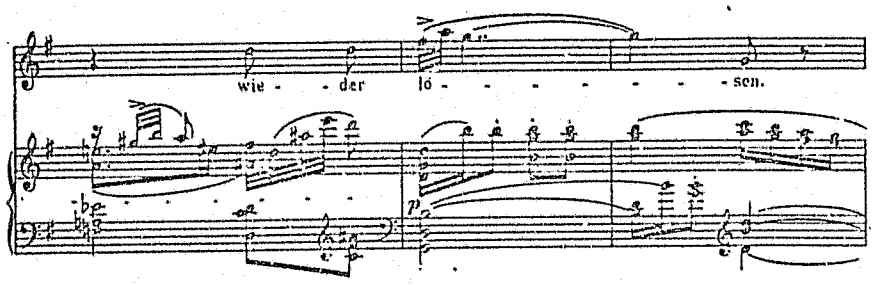
6.2.6 Use of the acciaccatura-figure

The use of the acciaccatura-figure to express a mood of light-hearted eroticism and teasing continues to be found, although there are fewer examples than in any of the earlier sets of songs.

i Bruder Liederlich, op.41 no.4, bars 28-32^{1}

ii Die sieben Siegel, op.46 no.3, bars 65-73





In this example the demisemiquaver rhythmic figure is simply an extension of the basic acciaccatura.

iii Morgenrot, op.46 no.4, bars 45-51[3]

CONCLUSION

The songs which have received attention in this study reveal a great deal about Strauss's development as a composer. He started his career steeped in the Classical and Romantic traditions, as the early sets of songs, in particular opp.10, 15 and 17, demonstrate. In the songs discussed in Chapter 1 the techniques involved are common to any other Romantic composer. As far as the harmonic techniques are concerned, keys lying in the relationship of a third to each other are often encountered. Chromaticism is present, but it is used against a clearly defined diatonic tonal structure. Programmatic techniques are in evidence, but their application is limited and to a large extent conventional.

After Strauss's meeting with Alexander Ritter, and his adoption of the ideal of Musik als Ausdruck, a marked change appears in his compositions. In the songs this manifests itself in various ways, two of which are the type of poems set and the type of programmatic techniques now employed. After Don Juan, these techniques occur consistently until 1906, and it is to be presumed that they also pervade the works subsequent to this date.

The presence of basic melodic motifs as a programmatic technique was not treated exhaustively in this study, since this aspect of Strauss's work demands an independent analysis. Furthermore, a word such as Nacht (night) consistently attains its colour through the application of a specific chord: generally a major triad, often on the flattened submediant degree, and placed in a low register. This type of technique would fall into the category of programmatic harmonic usage, which may also be coupled with melodic usage. Thus there is still much to be written regarding Strauss's programmatic techniques.

The most important issue dealt with in the present study is that of the actual harmonic analysis of Strauss's works, with the songs being taken as representative examples of his oeuvre as a whole. This aspect is one which is relevant to all Late-Romantic music. It was shown that Strauss's use of harmony is often, strictly speaking, atonal, since the criteria for determining tonality (as set out by Samson) are absent, and factors which negate tonality (as set out by Hindemith) are predominant. The most prominent of these factors in Strauss's music are:

- The melodic and harmonic use of the interval of a tritone. This interval, standing in the centre of the octave, presents a tonal problem when chords lie in this relationship to each other, since, regardless of its notation, it has neither a dominant nor a subdominant function in the key. In the context of functional harmony it is neutral in effect and cannot establish a key.
- With the consistent use of the tritone relationship between chords, tonality as a structural principle disintegrates because its very essence (the differentiation between dominant, subdominant and tonic) is negated. The effect of the music is then simply that of a continuous shift from one consonant level to another.
- Chromatic progressions are used in such a way that the term "diatonic" loses its meaning and must be replaced by the term "consonant". Thus in the most advanced songs tension is created by means of opposing dissonance and consonance, not diatonicism and chromaticism.
- Melodically, chromaticism is often superimposed on a diatonic framework, but it is used to such a degree that the harmonic background is almost totally obscured.

The result of all these factors is that many works may theoretically be analysed tonally. However, the present study concerns itself with an attempt to reconcile the aural experience with the theoretical results obtained through analysis. Where the aural experience is one of non-tonality, the analysis has been required to reflect this fact. To do this, it was considered necessary to define the concept of tonality more closely, thus avoiding a subjective interpretation of the music. Tonality thus has reference to a far narrower spectrum of music than it has in general usage. This means that a new analytical approach for Late-Romantic music must be formulated. The present study has considered the role that a few aesthetic issues, such as the expression of philosophical ideals, might play in such an analytical system. It is obviously by no means ideal and largely incomplete. Further enquiry is called for regarding the conditions under which tonality may be said to be negated. It is only once this issue has been clarified that the analysis of atonal music which is not dodecaphonic will achieve a greater degree of rationalism.
