

Abstract

This thesis explores “private property ownership” in Alexandra Township, South Africa. Adopting the term *mmastandi*¹ as an analytical tool I highlight that there are other ways of understanding private property. I argue that though closely linked to the mode of appropriating property, the term denotes more than just a name signifying “possessing a property”. Instead it invokes understanding of owning a stand, a piece of land which was developed through building a home. Additionally, at the core of the concept of mmastandi is the fact that the relationships to a stand were defined by a myriad of arrangements and agreements that were not necessarily codified. Hence categorising property ownership in Alexandra as simply individual and private is too simplistic and at best missing the point.

Mmastandi as an analytical prism complicates the geography-law nexus highlighted by Blomley (1994). It offers us an opportunity to interrogate further the overt agency role of bommastandi in their struggle to stay on in Alexandra a place that created (and still does) a problem for the South African government in that it refused to comply with the legal compartmentalization of the country. I argue that the culture of urban living that evolved from the ninety year long history of bommastandi’s life in Alexandra needs to be interrogated more closely. Such understandings and their engagement should form the basis of research that informs the larger South African urbanisation project, that of dismantling the apartheid city.

I do not claim that the concept mmastandi is new, neither do I claim to have discovered it. However, drawing from a broad spectrum of research and covering a long historical period, it uses all of these to the extent that they impact and simultaneously highlight the significant role played by the experiences of bommastandi in imploring us to rethink Alexandra. This process obliges us to use the Alexandra prism to understand more than private property ownership instead the urban land question and the African demand for recognition as urbanised emerge.

The study adopts property life stories² of these of families of *bommastandi*³ who continued to live in Alexandra despite the continuously changing political landscape and spatial legislation and used documentary sources as methodologies to glean empirical evidence. Drawing from these various sources is valuable for piecing together what is missing or silenced in recorded information. Although this study is based on experiences of land and property acquisition and dispossession by Alexandra property owners, it also serves as a window on the broader land question in South Africa. This is because Alexandra freehold was given to Africans at a critical moment in the history of the South African land question, the time when the “native” Land Bill which became the infamous “Native” Land Act, was discussed in parliament. It was also only two years into the merging of the former two Boer republics and the British colonies into the union of South Africa. This means that the country was still struggling with its rebirth but it was also dealing with, more often than not, diametrically opposed approaches to the “native” question. I argue that understanding the construction of “The paradoxical foreign native” is critical when interrogating property ownership among Africans in South Africa in general but in urban areas in particular.

¹ The term “mmastandi” or “mmastene” was used to denote African property owners in the earlier Johannesburg.

² Although Bozzoli (1991) adopts “life stories methodology” she does not draw a distinction between property owners and non-owners in Alexandra Township.

³ Plural of mmastandi.

Interrogating the meaning and the history of the concept of mmastandi called for an innovative way in which life story methodology played out in this thesis. The story told in this thesis explored the ways of life of families of bommastandi which highlights how they were identified in the community and also identified themselves in relation to their positions as private property owners. However, belonging to a group of bommastandi and the ways families of bommastandi experienced dispossession, resettlement and removals are in some instances as disparate as the ways in which they acquired their properties. The property life stories of families of bommastandi present an opportunity to rethink Alexandra Township as part of the broader South African land and urban question.

It is worth noting that the stories told by families of bommastandi connect their present to their past. The metaphor of palimpsest was adopted because it better captures their story of resilience and the specificity of their relationship to their properties, which is spatial, social and legal. Families of bommastandi experienced continuities and discontinuities in their relationships to their properties because the relationship of bommastandi who remained in their properties after expropriation show a complex continued occupation of space whose legal context changes from freehold to repossession and or expropriation. In other words we observe the continuities in their occupation of space and discontinuities in that the terms of that occupation change.

Finally, this thesis reveals bommastandi as ordinary human beings trying to make their lives work under difficult socio-political circumstances, but it also displays them as extraordinary people who fought the dislocation in their properties to the bitter end. Thus the story of the mmastandi of Alexandra is about a specific group but it is also about broader questions of African urban identities since such identities attach to African land more particularly in urban South Africa.

The use of the terms that may ordinarily be viewed as NOT politically correct is deliberate. More particularly, the term “native”, which is used to highlight the paradox of being declared foreign with the advent of reserves and later homelands in the country where one has been categorised as native all along. Finally the use of English measurements and currency is intended to highlight the important role played by this colonial history in our experiences as a people and a country. For example a fine of £5 for alcohol brewing for a family that relies on alcohol sale or a monthly salary of less than £4 explains a lot in this history.

Declaration

I declare that this thesis is my own unaided work. It is submitted for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in the University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg. It has not been submitted before for any other degree or examination at any other university.

Abueng L Matlapeng

_____ Day of _____ 2011.

Dedication

*In memory of my mother, Mmampe Matlapeng (MmaButi) and my niece, Ivy
Pitse
and more recently my nephew, Robert Pitse.*

Preamble

As a South African geography student who has a long history of fascination with black urban housing and squatter settlements coupled with an interest in histories of exception, the broader question of black resistance against government resettlements was for me immediately linked to the urban question. A casual conversation with a friend and a colleague who I was fortunate enough to share a workspace with, redefined the focus of this question to the singular experience of Alexandra. We were reminiscing about childhood memories of home when she started talking about her home in a way that I thought was quite profound. She talked about home as a place that still existed in her life, but had ceased to be the home that she came to know and love. She explained that her home had comprised a “big house” with some cottages. This was contrary to the generic “match boxes”; four roomed houses that comprised Johannesburg’s African urban landscape. From her description it was evident that this house was not only comfortable and spacious, but was also saturated with meaning: it made her proud to be black and urban, and to be so in a way that defied the boundaries of urban spatial legislation that governed the conditions of black urbanisation in South Africa at the time. But I have never been touched by the idea of owning and losing property, and the implications of this experience in material and symbolic terms, the way I was when having this conversation.

Such a conversation reminded me of the work of Ralph Mathews, a Canadian sociologist who published a study which he conducted among a fishing community in Newfoundland, Canada. In this study Mathews (1976) writes about three fishing communities whose life he describes as “often brutal and harsh”. Claiming that “there was no better place than home” these communities had, in spite of these hardships, defied all efforts by both provincial and national government urbanization policies that encouraged them to relocate. Although this occurred in a different country, Canada and in the 1970s, the experience of “harsh and brutal” life resonated with that of African life in South Africa in general but more particularly resettlements and relocations which characterized lives of African communities who lived outside reserves more particularly in the 1980s. Although the intentions of relocating the Canadian and South African communities were differently motivated, their resistance against resettlement was about staking a claim in a place called home. The resolute determination of the fishing communities to resist resettlement ignited in me an interest in a similar phenomenon in South Africa, black resistance against government resettlement.

My friend grew up in Alexandra, an exceptional space since it was exempted from the Natives Land Act No 27 of 1913. This act prohibited “natives” from buying private property or having rights to land away from the reserves – at the time a portion of the Union of South Africa that was delineated for “natives”. However, Section 1(1) of this law allowed the continued existence of townships whose proclamation predated the enactment of the 1913 Act and these included Alexandra. Thus Alexandra aptly encapsulates the South African urban land question, with all the trappings of black urban property ownership, accommodation/shelter (housing and squatting), coupled with resistance against forced removals and loss of private property. Such issues are raised in work such as Morris (1981), Sikakani (1977), Beavon (1982), Mabin and Parnell (1983) Horrell (1971, 1978) Haarhoff (1987), Black Sash (1988, 1989), Crankshaw, Hart and Mcnamara (1988), Harsch (1979), Hart and Hardie (1987), Maasdorp and Humphreys (1977), Mashabela (1980) and Stadler (1979) whose focus is housing shortage, squatting and forced removals.

Our conversation took me back to the allure I had for black urban life. Growing up in rural South Africa I was intrigued by the presentation of African urban life as temporary and yet permanent in some ways. I was captivated by the physical uniformity of the African urban houses which seemed to corroborate the transient status of their occupants. However, in Alexandra the red bricked, red roofed houses seemed to entreat one to rebut this notion of African urban evanescence. The life and socio-economic conditions of people who occupied these structures became clearer in our conversation. For the first time the heartfelt and lived experience of being modern, African and permanent in an urban area, were revealed in this apparently casual conversation that reawakened the interest I had in African urban life.⁴

The status of my “outsiderness” and the history of Alexandra made my reading of the place complex and layered but it simultaneously enabled me to question perhaps even some of the most taken-for-granted-experiences of bommastandi (property owners) of Alexandra. However, this time I particularly focused on Africans, who owned property in a place that not only increasingly became urban but was at the same time subject to attempts by the segregationist state to expunge this status through political and legal means.

Through the experience of bommastandi in Alexandra I recognised that while some of them may initially have been removed from their places they had appropriated in the urban space in Alexandra, they modernized but remained African. To many of these people, whether their properties were expropriated or not, Alexandra has never ceased to be home. As

⁴ Urban here is taken in its most basic and simplistic form to mean a place proclaimed urban and falling under a local government structure such as a municipality

I was doing my research and delving deeper into my study area that attempts to trace the connections between property ownership, identity and way of life, I found that this idea, “there was no better place than home” albeit complex and operating on many layers, makes sense, even to me as an outsider looking in!

Finally, my friend’s representation of the idea of a home was intriguing in that hers was a home that was somehow still there and yet had simultaneously disappeared. I became fascinated with the beginnings of Alexandra, a place that was conceived in the politics, the legislation and the economics of the time – 1912 - barely a year before the passing of the notorious Native Land Act No 27 of 1913. This was the beginning of a journey: a journey through property life stories that meant ploughing through history - spatial legislation, spatial and non spatial⁵ – resettlement history and land reform policy and memory. All of this ploughing centred on a two square kilometre piece of land.

⁵ Non spatial resettlement refers to a process where some property owners in Alexandra remained in their erstwhile freehold homes as government tenants after dispossession and forced removals

Acknowledgements

This thesis became possible through the support of many people at different stages of its development. I wish to thank D Posel, B Bozzoli, A Mbembe, and L Walker with whom I started this work. To my supervisors who saw me through most part of this journey I du Plessis, T Dirsuweit and A Mabin, my heartfelt gratitude. And finally, many thanks to A Zegeye, C Schutte, R Seete and N Nieftagodien who saw me through the difficult and last leg of this journey.

I would like to thank the Wits Institute for Social and Economic Research (WISER) through whose financial, infrastructural and intellectual support a dream of many years became possible. I want to single out Robert Muponde, Kgamadi Kometsi and Grace Khunou whose never ending discussions sparked off ideas that I never thought possible. Many other scholars contributed to this work through asking a question here and answering one there. But I would like to single out C Kihato, P Sekete, N Grootboom, M Ramutsindela, E Worby and T Nkacha who kept asking questions which put me forever on my toes. I am also grateful to the Oppenheimer Memorial Trust and Carnegie Foundation for their financial support. To Urban LandMark, the questions you raised in your day to day content sparked some thoughts and your readiness to allow me access to reading material and work space whenever needed was appreciated.

I give thanks to the late Prof Zeke and the late Mme. Rebecca Mphahlele who gave me their time at the darkest hour, when I was beginning to think that studying bommastandi was not a worthwhile journey. Sharing their experiences about life in Marabastad and Sophiatown pointed me towards the right and incredible direction.

Moipone Lenyai, my (erstwhile) colleague, our conversations planted a seed which started the journey to Alexandra where I met incredible people, children of the former bommastandi who were willing to give up their time and share their life experiences with me. To the group of bommastandi whose willingness to disabuse me of the misconceptions that I came armed with to your part of the world and memories going with all of these encounters will always be cherished.

To my family (Mojamorago ke kgosi), brothers, sisters, nephews and nieces: I would like to thank you for the unwavering support which kept me going even beyond my physical strength, it was through the confidence you showed in me that I got the energy to go on ... Papa Kobe Thakadu, seepela tse dingwe matsatsa ngwana ga Mmatsela a Mosime letebejana loo Mmasenosi! thank you for being my father and my lifelong teacher. Although you retired from teaching fifteen years before I started this journey you continued to tirelessly be my teacher, I will forever be grateful for the wealth of African experience, history and cultural input that is surpassed by none that helped me to unravel some of the puzzles and palimpsests that constitute African life. Last but not least my daughter Botho, who once more compromised by showing unbelievable understanding and maturity when she had to do with less by sharing her mom with this work.

Table of contents

Abstract	ii
Declaration	v
Dedication	vi
Preamble	vii
Acknowledgements	x
List of figures	xii
List of tables	xiii
Abbreviations	xiv
Map of Alexandra	xx
CHAPTER 1: Bommastandi of Alexandra Township	1
1.1 Background	1
1.2 Alexandra Township - An exceptional space	4
1.3 Purpose and Aims of Study	8
1.4 Research Question	8
1.5 The Notion of Mmastandi	10
1.6 Bommastandi Now	12
1.6.1 The Restitution of Land Rights Act No 22 of 1994	15
1.6.2 The Forgotten Mmastandi: The humiliation of loss	19
1.7 The Past in the Present	21
1.8 Methodological Considerations	23
1.8.1 Positionality as a Researcher: Writing from Within	24
1.8.2 Research Design	27
1.8.2.1 Qualitative approach	27
1.8.2.2 Research Methods	29
1.8.2.3 Documentary and Archival Records	29
1.8.2.4 Life stories as a strategy of the qualitative approach	31
1.8.3 Entering the field	33
1.8.3.1 ALPOA	34
1.8.3.2 Selection of respondents	36
1.8.4 Analysis of data	39
1.8.4.1 Content Analysis	39
1.8.4.2 Limitations and Ethical considerations	39
1.9 Characteristics of participants	41
1.9.1 Race and ethnicity	41
1.9.2 Different ethnic groupings which were identified among the respondents	41
1.9.3 The limits of this naming system	45
1.9.4 Age and gender of the main respondents	45
1.9.5 Points of origin	47
1.9.6 Relationship of primary respondents to bommastandi	50
1.9.7 Number and date of purchase of properties which were owned by families of the respondents	52
1.9.8 Occupations of bommastandi families	55
1.10 Chapter outline	58
1.11 Conclusion	61

CHAPTER 2:	RETHINKING ALEXANDRA	62
2.1	Introduction	62
2.2	The Many Faces/Phases of Alexandra?	64
2.3	Other Ways of Reading Alexandra	71
2.3.1	Property Ownership	72
2.3.1.1	There are many ways of skinning a cat: The Peter Rabbit Analogy	74
2.3.1.2	Access to Urban Land; Examples from Africa	75
2.3.1.3	Other Ways of Seeing Property Ownership in Africa: Structuration	78
2.3.1.4	Positioning South African Property Relations	80
	a) Property Owners of Alexandra: Bommastandi	82
	b) South African Urban Spaces	84
	c) Naming As Contestation of Space	90
2.3.2	Reading Alexandra Township: A Mmastandi Lens	92
2.3.2.1	The Identity of Mmastandi	92
2.3.2.2	Alexandra Revisited	94
2.3.4	The Citizenship Approach	97
2.4	Alexandra as Place	100
2.5.	Conclusion	102
Chapter 3:	ALEXANDRA’S EARLY MMASTANDI 1912 -1940	104
3.1	Introduction	104
3.2	Alexandra and Johannesburg	108
3.3	Alexandra: First Proclamation	109
3.4	Black Alexandra: The Second Proclamation	111
3.4.1	Who were the property owners?	113
3.4.2	What did buying property in Alexandra mean?	115
3.4.3	The 1913 Land Act: How did Alexandra become an exception to the rule?	118
3.5	Alexandra’s future threatened	128
3.5.1	Transvaal Local Government Commission of 1922	129
3.5.2	The Young Committee	137
3.5.3	Native Economic Commission	140

3.5.4	The Feetham Commission	144
3.5.5	The Urbanised Areas Administration or Thornton Commission	146
3.6	Way of life in early Alexandra	149
3.6.1	Inhabiting Alexandra: Ambivalence and uncertainty	151
3.6.1.1	Building a house	154
3.6.1.2	Ways of acquiring property	154
3.6.1.3	Private property and family relationships	157
3.6.1.4	“Home”: duality or absurdity?	159
3.6.2	Earning a living	161
3.6.3	Education	166
3.6.4	Early governance in Alexandra	168
3.6.5	Policing	172
3.6.6	Cemeteries and Burying the Dead	174
3.6.7	What was the significance of burying in Alexandra? The expression “sifela ndawonnye”	175
3.7	Conclusion	176

CHAPTER 4: GOVERNMENT DEEPENED CONFLICT WITH ALEXANDRA RESIDENTS 1940-1950s

178

4.1	Introduction	178
4.2	Problems in Alexandra: the view from the top	180
4.3	Alexandra and the National Party	188
4.4	Problems in Alexandra: the view from below	192
4.5	Redefinition of legal rights to Alexandra space	197
4.6	Ways of life: Life goes on in Alexandra	200
4.6.1	Changing from mud houses	203
4.6.2	Accessing a mortgage bond	204
4.6.3	New ways of building - “dibondo” (mortgage bonds)	206
4.6.4	Bond repayment	208
4.6.5	Property ownership and being humane	209
4.7	Conclusion	210

CHAPTER 5: INCREASED GOVERNMENT CONTROL IN ALEXANDRA 1958-1972	212
5.1 Introduction	212
5.2 Take-Over of Alexandra by PUAHB: Coincidence or Design?	213
5.3 What did The PUAHB Bring into Alexandra?	219
5.4 The “Hostel City”	221
5.5 The 1970s: The Hostels Are Here!	225
5.6 How Did The Appearance of Hostels Change Alexandra?	227
5.7 The Residents’ Response to the “Hostel City”	230
5.8 Ways of Life	231
5.8.1 The Legal and the Everyday	236
5.8.2 Moving to Rural Areas: Defeat or Acquiescence?	237
5.8.3 Racial Identity: A Strategy for Survival	238
5.9 Conclusion	240
 CHAPTER 6: REPURCHASING” OF PROPERTY IN ALEXANDRA 1973-1988	 242
6.1 Introduction	242
6.2 The Reform	243
6.3 The Administration Board	245
6.4 The Reprieve of Alexandra: Alexandra Mmastandi Are No More	246
6.5 The Mid-1980s	252
6.6 The 1988 Offer to Repurchase	254
6.6.1 Challenges of Repurchasing	255
6.7 Threats to Bommastandi Way of Life	256
6.7.1 Government as Mmastandi	258
6.7.2 Expropriations in Alexandra	259
6.7.3 Uprooting and Unsettling the Elderly	261
6.7.4 Compensation	261
6.7.5 Power of Owning: Whose Right to Alexandra Is Supreme?	264
6.7.6 The Impact of the Offer to Repurchase on the Lives of Bommastandi	267
6.7.7 Reclaiming an Alexandra Home	268

6.7.8	Purchasing or Multiple Repurchasing?	270
6.7.9.	What Happened to Other Families on the Properties after “Repurchase?”	271
6.8	Conclusion	273
CHAPTER 7: CONCLUSION: OTHER WAYS OF KNOWING		275
7.1	Introduction	275
7.2	The face of violence	276
7.3.	Losing a home is more than losing a house	279
7.4	The failure of bommastandi to regain their landlord status	284
7.5	Justice and fairness	286
7.5.1	Unfair compensation	286
7.5.2.	Humiliation and disrespect	290
7.5.3.	The subdivision of properties	293
7.6.	Through the Eyes of Mmastandi	295
7.6.1	Unsettling the notion of private property	296
7.6.2	On Identity	298
7.6.3	Political Dynamics	300
7.6.4	Methodological Considerations	300
7.7	New Perspectives	305
Bibliography		307
Appendices		344

LIST OF FIGURES

Figure 1	Traceable ethnic groupings and races of the respondent.....	42
Figure 2	Age and gender of the main respondents	46
Figure 3	Points of origin of the respondents.....	47

LIST OF TABLES

Table 1	Ethnic grouping of the respondents	43
Table 2	Details of points of origin of the respondents	48
Table 3	Relationship of Primary Respondents to Bommastandi	50
Table 4	Number and Date of Purchase of Properties Which Were Owned by Families of the Respondents	53
Table 5	Occupations of Bommastandi Families	55
Table 6	An example of information kept in the ATC property register Source	107
Table 7	Dates of white arrival from the Cape in various erstwhile Transvaal towns	114
Table 8	Enrolment numbers in different kinds of School	167
Table 9	History of stand 1 038.....	202
Table 10	History of stand 1 601 (Source National Archives, Rak 1028 1407 – 1649)	202
Table 11	Stands bought from bommastandi between 1960 and 1971	222
Table 12	How the Section 10 1 rights of the Native Urban Areas Act was applied in Alexandra	228
Table 13	Compensation amounts paid to bommastandi in the 1970s and 1980s.....	262

ABBREVIATIONS

AAC	Alexandra Action Committee
AAEC	Alexandra Anti Expropriation Committee.
ACA	Alexandra Civics Association
ACO	Alex Civics Organisation
AHC	Alexandra Health Committee
ALC	Alexandra Liaison Committee
ALPOA	Alexandra Land and Property Owners Association
AME	African Methodist Episcopal
ANC	African National Congress
ATA	Alexandra Tenants Association
ATC	Alexandra Township Company
AWNRP	Association of Waverly North Rate Payers
BAAB	Bantu Affairs Administrative Boards
CODESA	Convention for a Democratic South Africa
COSATU	South African Trade Unions
ETAC	Emergency Transport Action Committee
GAA	Group Areas Act
IFP	Inkatha Freedom Party
JCC	Johannesburg City Council
LAC	Local Area Committee
LDA	Lyndhurst and District Association
MOH	Medical Officer of Health
MP	Member of Parliament
NAD	Native Affairs Department
NEDPL	North Eastern District Protection League
NP	National Party
NSUTA	New Stand Holders United Tenants Association
NUAA	Native Urban Areas Act
PUAHB	Peri-Urban Areas Health Board
PUTCO	Public Utility Transport Corporation Limited
RDM	Rand Daily mail
SAIRR	South African Institute of Race Relations
SANNC	South African National Native Council
SAP	South African Police
SAYCO	South African Youth Civics Organisation
SOWETO	South Western Townships
TPA	Transvaal Provincial Administration
WNLA	Witwatersrand Native Labour Association
WPDHB	Witwatersrand and Pretoria District Health Board
WRAB	West Rand Administration Board
SPCA	Society for Prevention of cruelty to animals

MAP OF ALEXANDRA TOWNSHIP SHOWING STREET NAMES

Source:http://www.flashconstruct.com/joomla/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=59&Itemid=54 accessed October 19, 2011

Key For New Street Names

Vasco da Gama - Florence Moposho Street
Hofmeyr - Richard Baloyi Street
Selbourne - Reverend Sam Buti Street
Roosevelt - Alfred Nzo Street
Rooth - Josias Madzunya Street
London - Vincent Tshabalala Street

http://www.joburg.org.za/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=3066&Itemid=192