ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I owe an enormous debt to many Angolans who provided me with an invaluable assistance during my sojourn in Angola. Among those who must be acknowledged are Angolan Supreme Court Counsellor Judge António C.P. Caetano de Sousa, Deputy Chief Justice, and former President of the National Electoral Council of the 1992 Angolan first multiparty elections, who, in spite of short notice, was extremely generous in providing me with an interview and relevant published material on the 1992 Angolan elections; Mr. 'Kinito', Chief of Protocol to the Speaker of the Angolan Parliament, and Mr. Ventura de Azevedo, MPLA's First Secretary before the Parliament, who made the field research possible, especially in introducing me to the leaders of the opposition parties represented in the Angolan Parliament.

I am equally indebted to Mr. Teles Huo, Lecturer at the Eduardo Mondlane University, for the warm hospitality, especially in providing me with accommodation in his house with his family, during my fieldwork in Maputo, Mozambique. He personally introduced me to other academics from various departments of University and Non-Governmental Organisations whose activities were related to this dissertation.

Special thanks are due to my long-time good friend, Mr. António Matonse, former Press Adviser to the Mozambican President and newly appointed Mozambican Ambassador to Angola, for his valuable effort and good offices that made it possible for me to submit questionnaires to prominent personalities of the Mozambican society, like Dr. Mazula, former President of the Mozambican Electoral Commission that supervised the first multi-party elections in 1994.

I am also profoundly indebted to Professor Tom Lodge, Head of the Political Studies Department of this University, for personally making the first contacts for my fieldwork in Maputo, especially in asking Mr. Teles Huo's assistance. In his capacity as my Supervisor, Professor Lodge provided me graciously with insights, crucial recommendations and assistance indispensable in the final production of this dissertation.

My infinite gratitude and thanks go to H.E. Mr. José Leitão da Costa e Silva, former Chief of Staff in the President's Office in Angola and Minister in the President's Office; H.E. Mrs. Albina Assis, former Angolan Minister of Petroleum and H.E. Mr. Joaquim David, former Sonangol's Chief Executive Officer, for all the efforts they, collectively, in granting me the scholarship (under the supervision of De Beers SA first and Career Wise later) that enabled me to complete this degree.

I am particularly thankful and deeply touched by my friends, colleagues and lecturers at Wits for their heartfelt messages of condolences and support during the difficult time of the death of my loving father while I was still conducting my field research. I wish to thank especially Professor Lodge who, in the spirit of human solidarity allowed me to go back to Angola for a couple of weeks to pay my last respects to my late father as I was unable to attend his funeral. The messages of condolences embedded with love, comfort and prayers, encouraged me to emerge from the shadow of my suffering and rise from this great loss with greater fortitude and human capacity. These messages gave me the strenght, focus and courage in times of great sorrow, which helped me to persevere and to conclude this dissertation.

Many thanks to the staff of the Electoral Institute of Southern Africa (EISA) who at the request of my Supervisor welcomed me warmly to conduct an insightful research at their Library.

I also wish to express my sincere thanks and appreciation to the staff at the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung's office in Rosebank, Johannesburg, especially to M/s Andrea E. Ostheimer, for helping me with research material in the course of my fieldwork.

Last not least, my special thanks to Mrs Atty Van den Berg for editing this work.
