ABSTRACT

Sexual crimes against women and children are not new social phenomena. South Africa continues to experience high rates of such crimes against women and children, including rape, abuse, indecent assault and incest, with media reports highlighting the rape of children under the age of three years old. The current research was triggered by the call from various professionals to try and understand why such acts occur.

The main aim of this research was, through the identification and description of the demographic profile and psychosocial history of ten convicted perpetrators serving correctional sentences for the rape of children under the age of three years, to develop an understanding of the circumstances in the psychosocial histories of these perpetrators which may have led them to commit such acts.

The research design for the study was qualitative and followed phenomenological and ethnomethodological approaches that aimed to understand and interpret meaning that respondents ascribed to their lives. Grounded theory was used to analyze data obtained from a series of semi-structured interviews conducted with ten men serving correctional sentences for the rape of children under the age of three years. The data were categorized into a coding paradigm, which led to the formation of a proposition. The proposition suggests that the respondents in the current study, who have raped children under the age of three, have childhood psychosocial histories associated with physical and emotional abuse, as well as neglect, experienced most particularly from their mothers, within a milieu of desperate poverty. Such deprivation and maltreatment possibly led to attachment difficulties and influenced the development of adequate resilience. Similar difficulties were also noted during the respondents' adulthood. Some unemployed men possibly rape children under the age of three years, impulsively, in response to their feelings of anger, and need for revenge, against men and women. There was no suggestion from respondents who participated in the current study that their sexual acts were in response to the "virgin-cleansing" myth. However, the small sample size in the present research means that these findings cannot be generalized to all men who rape children under the age of three years.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Undertaking this research would have been impossible without the assistance from a variety of people and organizations. My sincere thanks and gratitude are therefore extended to the following:

Prof Sandra Drower, my academic supervisor, whose formidable insight, integrity, solid ethical base and academic guidance kept the research, and more importantly, the researcher, focused and objective.

Prof Gillian Eagle, whose sage counsel helped manage the many and difficult demands associated with research of this nature.

Ms Claudia Ford, from the Princess Trust, who contributed financially towards the cost of the research.

Mr Pelmos Mashabela, my internal guide from the Department of Correctional Services (DCS) and his colleagues at DCS who facilitated the research process. A particular note of thanks is extended to the DCS social workers who acted as the translators during the interviews and gave their time and assistance so willingly.

Senior members, and a social worker, from the Family Violence, Child Protection and Sexual Offences Unit of the South African Police Service.

Ms Carol Bower; Prof Belinda Bozzoli; Dr Marcel Londt; Prof Graeme Pitcher; Ms Brenda Roodt; Dr Tina Sideris; Prof Cora Smith; Prof Robert Thornton; Dr Sebastian Van As; Ms Sam Waterhouse; Ms Nicola Woodin; and the social workers at CATTS, for background information and consultation.

My friends for their constant support, particularly Mrs Zelda Kruger, Mr Timothy Trengove-Jones, and Mr Henry Wilson who sadly passed away before completion of the study.

Dr Andrew Gaylard and Dr Petra Gaylard for their computer wizardry.

My colleagues at the Cleft Palate Assessment Unit.

Mrs Sandra Porter.

Prof Merle Williams.

The research respondents who participated in the orientation process and the main study.

Last, and most importantly, I thank my wonderful and supportive husband Eric. I could not have undertaken and completed a project of this magnitude without him.
