DECLARATION

I declare that this research report is my own unaided work. It is submitted for the degree of Master of Arts in Sociology in the University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg.

Acknowledgements

This report would not be written without the support, handwork, knowledge and patience of Dr Shireen Ally, who not only served as my supervisor but also challenged me to discover the writer in me that I did not think existed. I am also grateful to my family and friends for their continued support and encouragement that kept me going through those final days of submitting. Thank you to Sociology of Work Unit (Swop) and Prof. Edward Webster for the opportunity to be where I am today. To the Dolls Thank You for your support and all those sleep less nights we spent together trying to hand in on time, you guys are the best.

Abstract

There are just over a million domestic workers in South Africa, accounting for 7.3 percent of total employment. According to Carroll (2004) about 10 percent of the country's estimated one million domestic workers are hired by black people. As an area that is largely occupied by African women the increased entry of African employers adds an interesting dynamic in the domestic work sector. The aim of this study was to look at the relationship that African domestic workers have with their African employers. Particular attention was given to the middle and working class Africans living in various townships in Soweto. By focusing on within-race interaction this study is aimed at emphasizing class as the defining characteristic of inequality in this sector.

The main broad finding in this study was that the employment relationship that African employers have with their domestic workers is not different from the traditional relationship between white employers and African domestic workers, as African employers reproduce some of the exploitation that existed in the sector. Despite legislative rights being awarded to domestic workers, a number of the domestic workers in the townships are still being paid below minimum wage, have no set working hours and work without any written contracts of employment. The study also revealed the use of the term 'helper' by African employers, as a way of building unity and equality in the relationship that they have with their domestic workers. The study concludes by suggesting that there is a need for a more forceful approach from government in ensuring that employers comply with the law.
