I certify that this submission does not exceed 25000 words.

Plagiarism is the "failure to acknowledge the ideas or writing of another" or "presentation of the ideas or writing of another as one's own" and should be read to cover intentional and unintentional failure to acknowledge the ideas of others. In this context "others" means any other person including a student, academic, professional, published author or other resource such as the internet. The University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg believes that failing to acknowledge the use of ideas of others constitutes an important breach of the values and conventions of the academic enterprise. It has therefore been resolved that all students should be required to sign a declaration that they are aware that they are required to submit their own unaided work and that plagiarism is unacceptable.

I declare the following:

- I am aware that plagiarism (the use of someone else's work without their permission and or without acknowledging the original source) is wrong; I am aware that any work that I submit for assessment must be my own unaided work except where I have explicitly indicated otherwise; I am aware that I must follow the required conventions in referencing the thoughts and ideas of others; I understand that the University of the Witwatersrand may take disciplinary action against me if I do not submit my own unaided work or if I fail to acknowledge the ideas or words of someone else in my writing and that lecturers are obliged to report incidents of plagiarism to the Plagiarism Committee of the School of Law;
- I have read and have a copy of the Senate Policy on Plagiarism which is also available online at https://www.wits.ac.za/science/schools/statistics-and-actuarial-science/academic-programmes/plagiarism-policy/
- I have read and understood the above plagiarism declaration and confirm that the work submitted is entirely my own except where otherwise acknowledged.

Abstract:

This research report is an exploratory study into two regional commercial music stations (YFM and 947) and their use of Twitter as a tool to relate to, interact with and enable participation from their audiences. Of particular interest was why they are using it, what they are doing with it and how this affects the on-air content pre, during and post broadcast, if at all it does. Commercial music radio listening for these two stations and particularly Y FM is now overlapped by discussions, comments, feedback and opinions on Twitter both connected to radio and separate. A new ecosystem has arisen that is hybridized and commercial music radio now sits side by side and is integrated into networking cultures. The radio station is a node within a much broader network and audiences are part of many networks, rather than groups who are part of specific social and economic clusters. The research found that idea of shifting audience power with regards to content for radio would appear to be false, at least in these two cases. The content posted on Twitter while visible to a network of individuals and organisations did not in this research stimulate any online conversation or take on a life of its own. Audience tweets received very little attention even from their own networks. Most content is promotional.

Further findings were that the current use of Twitter does not allow for participation in which the listener can directly influence the production process or the content direction. The level of response to content does not even reach 1% of the followers engaging or responding to the content posted. In the case of Y FM where tweets are used on-air, the research finds that the main difference in their incorporation into the on-air programme versus that of calls is in the auditory aesthetic that the tweets create in the overall broadcast. There is a distinct absence of personality in the tweets that are read on-air as they lack the genuine voice of the person contributing.

Background and rationale to the research question

Introduction

Commercial music radio stations create programming and products to build audiences in order to profit through the commoditisation of this audience. The greater the audience and the better the economic profile of that audience, potentially the greater the financial returns. Competition for ears is fierce and so stations carefully manage the relationship between themselves and their audience. Radio has always been seen as the most interactive medium and audience participation is a key part of this narrative. Traditionally the phone call has been the tool most used by stations to incorporate the listener and their opinion into the station's programming. Other methods such as SMS, e-mail, live interactions at outside broadcasts and letters have also played their part. For these, the station acts as gatekeeper to broadcast. With the development of new media and online platforms, stations are able to adopt or incorporate any number of new tools to interact or relate to their audiences. One of these platforms is Twitter and commercial music radio stations have been quick to adopt it as one of their communications channels.

Twitter provides stations with a platform through which they can communicate with and to the listener and there exists the potential for interaction, engagement and participation. Unlike the traditional methods of response that commercial music stations have used (SMS, phone call, e-mail, letter, etc), Twitter is a public platform that is visible to anyone who has access to the internet. If stations fail to use the response, comment or input, other users could still see what the person has said and engage or push their message as and how they want. If the stations do use the Tweets, users/listeners could verify or see the content themselves unlike with an SMS, E-mail or Caller. Furthermore they can create and share content and in their own way influence others. Potentially this could also influence music radio stations content production.

Research focus

This research report is an exploratory study into two regional commercial music stations (YFM and 947) and their use of Twitter as a tool to relate to, interact with and enable participation from their audiences. Of particular interest is why they are using it, what they are doing with it and how this affects the on-air content pre, during and post broadcast, if at all it does. The research will attempt to answer the core question of how commercial music radio stations Y FM and 947 utilise Twitter to relate to their audience and what the effect or role of Twitter is on the station's on-air content?

The two stations that are the subject of this research were selected for the following reasons:

1. Both of these stations are well established and have audiences of a similar size located predominantly in the same area of broadcast, Gauteng (RAMS, 2015).
2. Both stations have Twitter accounts that have large following. YFM have 404 000 followers and 947 just over 183 000 (Twitter, 2015).
3. Both are commercial music radio stations and do not have talk shows.
4. They have distinctly different audiences which will enable comparisons and contrasts to be made as to how they use Twitter, in what way and how it affects on-air content if at all. There is also an overlap in audience age in the 25-34 category.

It is important to note that no investigation was done prior to the research period as to how Twitter is used by these two stations. The above criteria were the determining factors in their selection.

The research further has the following aims and objectives:

1. To determine the manner in which Twitter is used by Y FM and 947 to relate to their audience.
2. To determine the extent to which Twitter content is incorporated into the on-air content of the station (if at all).
3. To analyse the intended use as set out by the station/presenters versus the data gathered from Twitter and determine how this relates to (1) and (2).

Background and Rationale

This research is of particular interest because there is not much research that has been conducted that directly looks at commercial music radio stations and their use of Twitter in relation to their broadcasting activities, specifically their audience and content. Existing studies that incorporate music radio have focused mostly on radio practices and cultures (Moyo, 2012; Ligaga and Chiumbu, 2012), on the impact of Twitter on radio journalism, breaking news events and the audience (Rosales, 2012; Hermida, 2010; Dueze, 2005; Rosen, 2006; Newman, 2009; Fenton, 2010) and finally radio convergence and the corporate logic of audience (Willems, 2012). The focus of this research report is not news journalism but rather the under researched genre of commercial music radio and specifically their use of Twitter. However, the impact and effect of new technologies on news journalism will be drawn upon in the discussion.

Commercial music radio stations are by design very different from traditional news organisations or community radio and as such they exhibit profoundly different characteristics and imperatives. These stations focus their programming to specifically cater for a clearly defined audience in order to maximise the financial return. In more simplistic terms, they build audiences around products in order to profit and are run with a strong business model. There are two key components to this matrix: firstly, the creation of a product and, secondly, an audience that consumes this product. The more viable the product, the larger the audience and therefore the greater the financial return. However it is not just the audience size but the economics of this audience that directly impacts on the ability of the station commoditise its listeners. So attention is paid to build products for audiences that are financially more lucrative. Presenters pay attention to select content that is specific or relatable to the audience the station has designed its programming for.

A key characteristic of radio has been its ability to connect in real-time to a multitude of people in a personal way. When radio broadcasting began, there was no concept of an audience and interaction or participation in the broadcast was not something considered by those involved (Douglas, 1999). The early years were dominated by hobbyists and enthusiasts and the technical barrier to entry prohibited ordinary citizens from accessing the broadcasts (Chignell, 2009). The shift in the 1920s through the introduction of radio sets using valve (tube) technology shifted the focus from a small group of enthusiasts to the larger public. In this early stage of broadcasting, there was no interaction with the audience and the broadcast was merely received. From the 1920s until the 1960s, participation or audience involvement was very limited and mostly constituted letters to the station or live studio audiences. It wasn't until the introduction of the telephone in the 1960s that a form of live interaction/participation began. The phone-in programme and caller became a part of radio stations offering and although mediated by the station this has been the dominant traditional tool of interaction between the audience and the station. In the 1990s, e-mail, SMS's as well as fax were additional tools stations could use for audience participation.

With the arrival of social media, facilitated by the internet, a new potential set of tools has been added to the matrix through which the station can relate to, interact with and potentially invite participation from its audience. Social media is different to the other tools mentioned above in that it is accessible to others and not just the station. In other words social media content directed towards a station or in response to the station can be seen by other members of the audience regardless of whether it is used, acknowledged or commented on by the station as part of it on-air or online conversations (Bonini, 2014). The specific social network that is the focus of this research is Twitter.

Twitter is a fascinating medium as it has many parallels to radio: immediacy, personalisation, intimacy, audience, participation, segmentation as well as the knowledge that others are consuming what you are consuming at the same time (a sense of community). Radio stations have been quick to adopt Twitter and include it as part of their offering to their audience (Murthy, 2001; Ferguson & Greer, 2011). A quick survey of commercial music radio stations in South Africa revealed that they all have a Twitter account. This raises interesting questions as to how they are using it, why they are using it, what they are using it for and how it impacts on radio content, if at all. This research report shall explore the complexities of these and other important questions posed above and in the methodology section. There is a similarity with the challenges facing journalism which this report shall briefly explore and a possible shift in the way in which stations relate to their audiences and content.

Much has been said about how technological convergence on radio seems to carry the potential of democratising and opening up radio to audiences (Moyo, 2012). The internet and mobile phones have the capacity to enable more participatory and interactive communication either through user generated content or broader participation by audiences in radio's content production (Willems, 2012). In South Africa, the significance of the potential for audience involvement and participation in radio is even more relevant given the repressive history of radio and its audiences during Apartheid. Under the Apartheid regime, radio was state owned and audiences as well as their involvement in radio carefully controlled. Content was manipulated to serve the interests of the ruling elite and ensure that only specific information was communicated. The emergence of the three tiers of broadcasting in the 1990s - public, commercial and community enabled South Africa to develop a plurality of broadcasters and the possibility for radio audiences for the first time to interact and participate in the programming (Mtimde, 2003). It is out of this reshaping of the radio broadcasting sector that the two stations that are the focus of this report emerge.

Y FM

Post the end of Apartheid, the spectrum was opened up to new commercial players regionally. Y FM was one of these new emergent stations that started broadcasting in 1997 from Bertrams, Johannesburg. Targeting the black urban youth, the station looked to be the leader of the youth experience and their voice in the democratic South Africa. The station grew rapidly in popularity and directly defined and shaped much of the urban music development (Broadcast.Media, 2015). Kwaito music's rise to iconic status was largely attributable to the station. With just over 1.46 million listeners in 2015, Y FM is the now largest station aimed at young people between the ages of 15 and 35 in Gauteng (RAMS, 2015). Self-proclaimed GP's hottest frequency, Y FM has an audience that is 94% black, 3% coloured, 1% white and 1% indian with 1% percent unaccounted for (YWorld, 2015). 79% of their audience is between the ages of 15 and 35 and the station has a commanding market share amongst young people (RAMS, 2015). Of the 79%, 42 % of their audience is between 15 and 24 years in age and the 37% between 25 and 35. The station's listenership is mostly male 60% and black. The Y FM audience is located predominantly in LSM's 5-6 and 7-8 (42% & 36%) which means that their disposable income ranges from R 4242 per month to R 17 462. These LSM's see most individuals having obtained matric and some having furthered their education to a diploma or degree (SAARF, 2015). The station employs a Hot Urban format which means that music is current hits as well as new music with genres typically more urban focused: hiphop, rnb, house and dance.

947, then Radio Highveld started broadcasting as an SABC station in 1964 as a regional service providing audiences with hourly news bulletins and easy listening music. In 1996, the station, along with 6 other SABC stations was sold off in order to firstly diversify the airwaves and secondly to raise much needed revenue. The original intention of the sale was that the proceeds of the sale would go to the SABC to fund the public service radio stations and the SABC agreed to the sale of Highveld and other stations on this basis. In reality however the proceeds of the sale were taken by the Department of Finance and went towards the fiscus (Banerjee and Seneviratne, 2006). The government deemed the sale as the sale of state assets. Primedia purchased Radio Highveld.

In 2015, the station has an audience of 1,26 million listeners predominantly in Gauteng. There is a 51% male to 49% female split in the gender of this audience with 44% white listeners, 40% black, 7% coloured and 10% indian. The station underwent a rebranding exercise in 2014 and removed the word Highveld from the station's brand identity. This was in order to refocus the brand and attract a younger audience as well as appeal to the fast past urban Johannesburg resident. As programming manager Ravi Naidoo said in an interview with ask-y.co.za: "Short, Sweet and to the point, just the way Joburgers like things (Thornton-Dibb, 2014)."

The station directly sells its audience as young, class mobile and optimistic about the country's future as well as their own. They are social networkers and engaged with technology. They are well educated with most having post matric or a degree and they fall mostly directly within LSMs 7-10. This means that the average household income ranges from R 10 857 to R 35 919. Their audience is mostly between the ages of 25 and 49 with 29% located in the 25 to 34 category and 31% between 35 and 49. The station uses an adult contemporary format with music typically being from established current hits to older song from the last two decades (947, 2015).

As mentioned, both stations have a strong Twitter presence and each has active social media accounts. They provide an interesting case study as their core audiences are located in different age groups, Y FM 15-24 and 947 35-49. The research in this report will hopefully also uncover some insights into how the station and its audiences are using Twitter as well as why they are using it and if it has an effect on on-air content. What is interesting is that 947 positions its audience as young and class mobile yet the bulk of their audience, 60% is 25 to 49 years of age. Y FM on the other hand is genuinely younger with 79% of their audience under the age of 34. While there are overlaps in the age demographic of their audiences in the 25 – 34 bracket, the core audiences are from different age demographics which will enable some comparisons and contrasts between the different age groups.

Literature review and theoretical framework

Technological change has impacted on radio and its relationship with its audience at key points within the history of the medium. These changes have or in future could have direct implications for the processes, practices and methods that these stations implement to create, produce and deliver content as well as to attract, interact and relate to their audience. These changes will be further explored in this section as well as their impact or potential impact on commercial music radio. An argument will be made through the use of new media theory, for the networked audience. This will be used as part of the analysis of the data of this research. New media technologies, specifically web based social network sites and Twitter will be outlined. Furthermore, the concept of access, interaction and participation as it relates to radio will be investigated.

Radio and its audience

From the inception of radio, the relationship between radio and its audiences has shifted and changed as new technologies and developments have impacted on this relationship. Some writers and scholars have attempted to periodise the history of audiences and to classify the relationship between radio and the audience. In writing about audience history, Abercrombie and Longhurst (1998) are one of the most well-known with their identification of three broad periods of radio audiences namely: the simple, co-located, face-to-face audience; the mass audience; and the diffused audience. The last concept of the diffused audience is one in which the audience is "no longer contained in particular places and times, but rather part and parcel of all aspects of daily life" (Abercrombie and Longhurst 1998, in Livingstone 2005, 26). It is this concept that would seem to best describe the current relationship between radio and its audience.

However Abercrombie and Longhurst (1998) were writing pre web 2.0 and the development of social network platforms. It is in this context that Bonini and Monclus (2015) reconceptualise the historical periodization of radio listening to include the concept of the networked society. They set this out in four clear auditory regimes, which use the framework set out by Abercrombie and Lonhurst (1998), the last of which is characterized by the hybridization of broadcasting media and networked media. The periodization outlined in this section of this report is an attempt to show the changing relationship between radio and its audience as well as highlight the cause of or technological changes that have impacted on the new relationship between radio and its audience in the contemporary era.

Marconi and Fessenden never envisaged a time when their experiment would become a means of providing entertainment and information to mobile and transient audiences (Hausman, Messere, Benoit, O'Donnell, 2013). Radio in its early days was closed to the majority of the population as it required a large amount of technical knowledge to setup and operate the equipment. These early users of radio were mostly male, technically skilled and operating their radios as a hobby rather than a service. They listened to radio using headphones and their listening experience was predominantly solitary. This was fundamentally changed in the 1920s with the introduction of the valve (tube) radios which were incorporated into wooden boxes carefully designed to look like a piece of furniture. This effectively moved the radio set as Chignell (2009) puts it, "from the garden shed and into the house" (2009: 63). It is within this context that the first age of the radio audience arises.

The first age (1920-1945): the invisible medium for an (almost) invisible public.

The audience remained hidden and inaudible with relatively no means to interact or engage with radio, they were simply able to listen or tune out (Bonini and Monclus, 2015). There was an inability for the audience to publicly voice their feelings, thoughts or opinions on the programme and some have argued that audiences were essentially passive in this period (Douglas, 2004; Chignell, 2009).

However this assertion was not entirely true as two distinct forms of audience feedback or input came to light in this era. Although not ultimately impactful on the voice of the audience in the day to day broadcast and creation of content, they are still worth mentioning. The first method the audience could and did use in this era was to write a letter to the station to input on content, how they felt or what they wanted. However this was shown to be largely considered as input from misfits and oddballs by the broadcasters (Sayre, 1939). This interaction, input or attempt to dialogue with stations was largely not understood during this phase of broadcasting and the audience was mostly seen as a mass group of consumers (Bonini and Monclus, 2015). In addition to letters, listeners formed listener clubs and these became spaces where they could gather, listen and discuss. Although not directly talking to or inputting on the radio programme, they stimulated discussion beyond just the private space and brought radio programmes in the public space. They enabled in some form, although at a micro level for the audience to express their feelings, thoughts and opinions.

The invention of focus groups by Stanton and Lazarfeld with their invention of the Stanton-Lazarsfeld Program Analyzer in 1937 as well as the first audience surveys made listening habits measurable for the first time (Douglas, 2004). Douglas (2004) further goes on to emphasize in her book that public sentiment remained undetected and misunderstood during this period of broadcasting. This was a one-to-many model of communication which saw broadcasters in this era transmit content that they determined in the public interest. This was a top down approach to radio content that was strongly controlled by the radio institutions. Mostly this content was to educate and inform the population (Chignell, 2009). There was no audience participation from those listening in the home or as a part of listener clubs. Where audience voices were incorporated into the broadcast these took the form of live studio audiences. The audience could directly participate but only those who were physically present. Despite their non-inclusion in radio programming, there were attempts by the audience in this era through letters and the listener clubs to take part in the discussion, to create some sort of collective connected listening (Bonini and Monclus, 2015).

The second age (1945-1994): the invisible medium for an audible public.

The second era of broadcasting Abercrombie and Longhurst (1998) identified was the period 1945 – 1994 which they aptly entitled "an invisible medium for an audible public". This period was characterized by the introduction of the transistor radio in the 1950s which radically changed the way in which radio was consumed as well as the introduction of the telephone into radio's productive practices (Bonini and Monclus, 2015). This era is further marked by the introduction of pirate radio as an alternative to the public radio, something that would help shape and develop the new formats and programme concepts that change the way radio was produced.

The transistor meant that radio sets reduced in size and one no longer required a large space to accommodate them. It enabled radio to be portable, affordable and more widely accessible to a greater number of people. Further to this, 60 % of motor vehicles in America in the 1950s were fitted with radio receivers which meant that for the first time radio was accessible as people commuted (Douglas, 2004). These technological developments reintroduced private listening to radio as well as the ability for listening on the move to take place. It changed the spaces in which listening took place, shifting from the domestic environment to anywhere that the radio signal could reach (Keith, 2008). Group listening could now take place as part of the social experience for example at a picnic or whilst travelling to a concert. Douglas (2004) puts it well by saying: "At work, in the car, on the beach, people – especially young people – brought radio with them and used it to stake out their social space by blanketing a particular area with their music, their sportscars, their announcers. With transistors, sound defined social space." (2004: 221)

The shift in how radio was consumed, coupled with the move of traditionally successful as well as popular radio formats such as comedy, documentaries, dramas and soaps to the medium of television meant that radio needed to adapt. The competition from television for audience and the decrease in revenues led radio stations to develop formats aimed at attracting listeners. Fifties America saw the rise in popular music and the top 40 format known as contemporary hits radio. Along with this format, many sub formats arose such as adult contemporary, country, jazz, gospel and so on (Hausman, Messere, Benoit, O'Donnell, 2013). The audience became an important part of post-war radio broadcasters strategy and the thinking as to how the audience equated to economics and power (Keith, 2008). This was not only the case for commercial stations but also for public radio stations facing competition from television. Hendy (2007) says: "...that in the face of television, radio had 'lost its compulsiveness', and that few listeners any longer bother to look at the printed schedules in their daily papers or in the Radio Times" (2007: 53).

He goes on to say when referring to the BBC: "...that each of the four networks needed to offer services with a definite and recognisable programme character, so that listeners could tune in with a reasonable expectation of getting what they wanted and knowing when they could expect it" (Hendy, 2007: 63).

Targeted formats with predictable schedules gathered interested individuals into a group, a large audience, who felt a sense of belonging and community through their station of choice. Radio had always had this idea of co-presence, in other words the knowledge that others were listening and part of the moment (Chignell, 2009). Often the discussion and programmes became conversation in the workplace or on the way to work, what some may refer to as the water cooler conversations. Targeted formats started to find ways to include the audience within their programming and the incorporation of the telephone was its most important addition in this regard. This has become synonymous with radio as a means to involve the audience in the on-air programme and listener's had begun to take part in radio, by using the telephone. The creation of pirate/new radio stations further opened up audience involvement and provided more choice for audiences than the state owned stations. These pirate stations were also often put together by members of the public and not by professionals which meant a broader participation in the production of radio. However for the majority, involvement in the production was not something they could or did do.

The audience was still invisible, but it had become audible (Bonini and Monclus, 2015). While the vast majority of the audiences were content to remain as listeners, the phone-in represented the possibility that they could interact with the programme and others (Shingler and Wieringa, 1998). It brought the sound of the listener on-air and the voice of a previously silent entity to life. Tone, accent, language provided unique auditory texture to the sound of the stations output. This involvement or participation is however controlled and limited within the overall programming output by the station. The producers and or presenters decide who can contribute or be heard and on what they can be heard. Listeners' opinions and emotions in this era were becoming increasingly public, but as yet these were not measurable and mostly the audience was still passive (Bonini and Monclus, 2015).

The third age: (1994-2004): an invisible medium for a readable public Bonini and Monclus (2015) drawing on Abercrombie and Longhurst (1998) identified the third auditory regime/age of the audience for the period 1994-2004 and termed it: an invisible medium for a readable public. The technological innovations in the 1990s saw the development of several new technologies that greatly altered the way that radio and its audience could communicate and interact. Most notable of these were the addition of mobile telephones, text messaging, the internet (World Wide Web), audio streaming, email and post 2000 blogs and audio podcasting.

For the first time since the introduction of radio, the audience did not need to be fixed to a physical location in order to make calls nor were the reporters or producers of radio bound to studio or locations with fixed line connections. Mobile phones facilitated radio reporting and production outside of the studio and potentially increased listener participation in the radio conversation. As Bonini and Monclus put it "the possibility of calling the radio station from a public place with a mobile phone transformed the role of the audience: from private citizens to potential reporters, or citizen journalists" (2015: 13). This meant that listeners could now produce content from places that they were calling from and things like news, traffic and eye witness accounts could take on a new type of voice. The audience contribution now had the potential to evolve and strengthen and the ordinary man, who could start to feature more in radio content, something that was later described as the 'demotic turn' (Turner, 2009).

Other means of audience involvement such as SMS and e-mail became common place during this era. This transformed the audience contribution and made their voices readable in almost real time unlike the letters of the bygone era. Presenters and producers would not only hear the voice of their audience via the phone, but could also read their voice through the SMS text messages and emails. Audiences could also read the presenters emails or blog and respond to this. This gave an additional dimension to contribution and involvement of the audience. These developments "updated the private relationship between host and listener, which until then was only based on paper letters" (Bonini and Monclus, 2015: 14). Additionally it reduced the spatial and temporal distance between radio and its audience. Texts or emails could be read on-air within seconds of being received and the audience could respond within seconds hearing something they wished to comment or input on. Software tools were developed that enabled stations to sort and organize the incoming messages. Bonini and Monclus put it well when they said: "the readability and real-time access of SMS and email enhanced the publicness of the public's opinions and feelings" (2015: 14). The power still ultimately lay in the hands of the producers of radio content as to whether they would use the content received via these platforms in the on-air content.

The development of audio streaming in 1995 started a new generation of radio producers who could create and distribute their content via online audio stream to an as yet to be defined audience. This group is similar to the radio pirates of the 60s and 70s and their content is created outside of the traditional radio space. Streaming audio was quickly adopted by the traditional media to further the reach of their content beyond the physical restraints of their terrestrial signal which potentially opened them up to additional audiences or communities. Added to this development, was podcasting in 2004. Podcasting essentially meant that content creators and traditional radio could now make content available on demand or post broadcast. This development would be part of the fibre of audio consumption in the 4th phase.

Audience participation or involvement is still on the radio station's terms. However the tools to production were now also available to the listener and there enabled them for the first time to create content and distribute this online. However this did not impact that much on the traditional media and their content production or engagement with their audiences. The internet and social media however potentially changed this relationship (Schackman, 2013) and this is what Bonini and Monclus (2015) with influence from Ito (2008) writing in a book edited by Varnelis (2008) outlines as the fourth age of broadcasting where radio is a visible medium for a networked public.

The fourth age (2004-?): visible medium for a networked public

Ito when defining the networked public says: "The term networked publics references a linked set of social, cultural, and technological developments that have accompanied the growing engagement with digitally networked media. The Internet has not completely changed the media's role in society: mass media, or one-to-many communications, continue to cater to a wide arena of cultural life. What has changed are the ways in which people are networked and mobilized with and through media. The term networked publics is an alternative to terms such as audience or consumer. Rather than assume that everyday media engagement is passive or consumptive, the term publics foregrounds a more engaged stance. Networked publics take this further; now publics are communicating more and more through complex networks that are bottom-up, top-down, as well as side-to-side. Publics can be reactors, (re)makers and (re)distributors, engaging in shared culture and knowledge through discourse and social exchange as well as through acts of media reception" (2008, 2).

According to Arvidsson: "a public is a mediated association amongst strangers who are united by a however momentary affective intensity that is directed towards a common thing" (2013, 374). In other words they are united around things like a brand, a celebrity, a news story, a radio programme, etc.

The new public emerging from the hybridisation of broadcasting and ICT technologies is a networked one. Listeners are no more just audiences or as Rosen (2008) aptly said the people formally known as the audience. Of all the changes that network culture may bring us, the reconfiguration of the publics of radio is likely to be the most significant. Networked technologies reorganize how information is distributed, consumed and how people consume, interact with the information and each other. Networked publics share four fundamental characteristics that inherently make them different from the previous mediated publics: persistence, replicability, scalability and searchability (Boyd, 2011).

Persistence on social networks essentially means that the public's content is automatically recorded and archived. Feedback, opinion, comments or input from listeners remains online for a long time and similarly this applies to the radio stations. Their output can be seen and archived online in a manner that can help build or reduce their appeal to the public. Replicability simply means that the content produced can be easily reproduced. Scalability refers to the ability for great visibility although this is not guaranteed. So for radio this means that the listeners commenting on, posting to or engaging with station content on its social network can reach or be seen by a wide audience. Searchability means that the content posted or put on the social network can be easily accessed and searched (Bonini and Monclus, 2015).

Bonini and Monclus sum this up very nicely "Networked publics represent the type of public that has emerged from the network society, and refer to any type of public that is organized in a network (2015: 18). The term 'produsers' came out of this era and was phrased by Bruns (2008). The term produser emphasizes the productive aspect of users and the potential to not only consume but to produce and add to the content created. User generated or developed content online takes place in a variety of environments, one of which Twitter, is the subject of this research paper and this will be more clearly outlined in the next section. While many users/listeners still remain silent and are not produsers, they are now visible nodes on an interconnected network of which the radio station is one such node. They are part of the digital community of radio as well as part of other online communities. Content is easily spreadable once placed online and the networked public have the power to do this (Jenkins et al, 2013). Consumption of radio may now not always be of the live transmission but post via audio podcasts or shared content (Crisell, 2012). It is within this context of the fourth era that social networks arise and the subject of this paper, Twitter. This is a further evolution of technology and another potential shift in how radio and its audiences relate which is critical aspect in understanding the research in this report. Social networks, specifically Twitter as well as the concept of networked radio audience will be explored in the next section.

Social Networking Sites (SNS), Twitter and the Networked Radio audience

The auditory regime of the fourth era outlined in the previous section is one of connected listening in which the very concept of listening is changing as it can now be live or consumed at a later time. Radio listening is overlapped by discussions, comments, feedback and opinions on social networks both connected to radio and separate. This is a new media ecosystem, it is hybridized and traditional radio broadcasting now sits side by side and is integrated into networking cultures. This has impacted on how radio content is consumed and circulated. It mixes the old one too many model of radio broadcasting, which employed a top down approach to content to a new model that includes many to many, one to one and in which a more participatory model is emerging (Jenkins et al, 2013). Audiences are now viewed as network of listeners who are part of many networks, rather than groups who are part of specific social and economic clusters with the old concept of fixed membership to these (Bonini and Monclus, 2015; Livingstone, 2003). It is within this era that social networks arise.

Social networking sites (SNS) have attracted millions of users over the past five years and many people have integrated these sites into their daily routine. While the technological features of these sites are fairly similar, it is the culture that emerges around these sites that is varied. Many of the sites such as facebook, myspace and bebo allow users to maintain pre-existing relationships. In other words it enables them to bring physical real world relationships into the online space. That said it also allows for new relationships to form with complete strangers around common interests, language, political views, music and a whole host of other content. The primary reason for opening an account on an SNS is not to connect with strangers but rather to maintain existing relationships many of which may be tenuous in the real world (Boyd & Ellison, 2008). For example users may connect online with someone who they were at University with but were not really friends.

The whole point of the internet initially was to allow for people with common interests, beliefs and ideas to collaborate and share information. So does this now mean that the entire internet is one big social network? The answer is no, as certain conditions determine whether something online is a SNS or something else. Boyd and Ellison have offered the most widely used definition of social networking sites: Web-based services that allow individuals to (1) construct a public or semi-public profile within a bounded system, (2) articulate a list of other users with whom they share a connection, and (3) view and traverse their list of connections and those made by others within the system (Boyd & Ellison, 2008: 211).

This is a useful definition to start the conversation on SNS, however as the social networking sites have developed, there is now a need to further define them into two distinctive categories: those that enable content sharing (youtube, pinterest, flickr, etc) and those that are relationship-building applications (facebook, Twitter, linkedin, etc) (Albarran, 2013).

In this research I am focusing on a relationship building SNS. The research shows that most SNS's primarily support existing real world relationships and enable people to maintain and grow these through the SNS. Facebook is a good example of an SNS used for this purpose as users need to confirm friendship in order for the individuals to be able to connect on the platform. These pre-existing relationships no matter how weak are connected in the real world to something (university, school, common interest, travel, etc) and it is this element that according to Boyd & Ellison (2008) differentiates SNS's from earlier forms of computer-mediated communication such as newsgroups.

The online profile created by individuals within these sites is an extension of themselves with varying degrees of truth. Self-representation in these networks and articulation of friendship links is very important to the identity of the owner (Bonini and Monclus, 2015). This is the digital representation of what some refer to as the "old boys" club. It shows your social capital, how connected you are and what your influence is. The research done by Boyd & Ellison in 2008 was too early to factor in the SNS, Twitter. The one thing that differentiates Twitter from many other SNS's is that while many connections between users may be made through real world connections, many are also formed through the platform itself around content and interaction. While there is little research to analyse this, the architecture of the platform enables users who have no connections to connect (Twitter, 2015). A user can simply follow someone who they find interesting and can direct messages at this user regardless of their acceptance.

Twitter is an interesting SNS as it enables both relationships from the pre-existing world to move online but also for new relationships to form around content. Twitter has been used in many parts of the world to break news. This has not been done by traditional media but rather by individuals who are experiencing the event in question. This brings to mind the Iranian Elections of 2009, the attacks in Mumbai in 2008 as well as the downed US Airways flight in 2009 (Newman, 2009; Murthy, 2011). The massive popularity of social networking has also seen audiences generate and share their own content such that media organisations are often left trailing behind the breaking news story which is more often than not first published by online users who witness it first-hand (Shirky, 2009). The convention within this network to organise content around specific things is the use of the hashtag. This can create a conversation thread and temporary community based on specific content or event. The use of a hashtag enables users to locate all content in a conversation thread and join in the conversation. This means that different communities can be created within the Twitter platform both permanent as well as temporary. Users can join or exit these communities or conversations as they please and themselves create new ones. They do not have to follow the individual users in order to follow or join in the conversation and can be involved in multiple conversations at the same time (Murthy, 2011; Twitter, 2015).

Twitter's mission statement encapsulates what they envisage the service to provide its users with namely: "To give everyone the power to create and share ideas and information instantly, without barriers" (Twitter, 2015).

By giving the power to everyone to publish and in the way it is constructed, Twitter breaks the traditional one-to-many model of most established media and enables alternative communication models of many to many as well as one to one to become a reality. Key to the platform is the ability of users to not only create and share instantly but to reply to any users tweet and themselves converse on any topic regardless of the original user's presence or involvement. This means that content is visible without censorship to anyone on the platform. Once a user tweets, their tweet is visible to other users and becomes part of the public domain. Twitter does have terms and conditions which prohibit certain types of tweets. However by the time they are removed, they are mostly likely to have been seen, re-tweeted, images of the tweet screen grabbed and so on which means that the content may resurface despite having been removed. Twitter is by the definition put forward in the previous section a networked public as it satisfies the four characteristics of persistence, replicability, scalability and searchability (Boyd, 2011). Users tweets are instantly archived, could be easily replicated, are visible to a greater audience with potential to influence and via hashtags or phrases searchable.

In South Africa, there are six million Twitter users in 2015 a number that is 20% higher than in 2014 (World Wide Worx, 2015). If growth continues at this level, we can expect 10million users within three years.

In a study by Compete (2013), it was found that 18 to 34 years olds are 21% more likely to access Twitter primarily via their mobile device. Primary mobile users were found to be 181% more likely to use Twitter on their commutes and once at work/school. They are also 127% more likely to use Twitter when out with friends and 57% of them communicate with people close to them via Twitter. Primary mobile users aren't just checking Twitter more often, they are also creating and engaging with more tweets too. Primary mobile users are more plugged into the "liveness" of the space and are more likely to be in conversation more often.

This is interesting given the research conducted by De Lanerolle (2012) which showed that in South Africa the profile of these mobile users is young, with new users under 25 years of age accounting for 51% and those between 25 and 34 years of age 31%. This means that 72% of new users are under 35 years of age and less than 14% of them own a personal computer (De Lanerolle, 2012). Many of these new users started to use the internet post 2008 as social media, micro blogging and increased accessibility took South Africa by storm. Access is ever increasing in South Africa, with one in three South Africans accessing the internet in one form or another in 2012 (12.3 million people). This figure has doubled in the last four years alone and is predicted to reach almost half the population by late 2014 (De Lanerolle, 2012). By 2016 almost 75% of the population could be connected if user growth continues at this rate. The research found that seven out 10 people access the internet using their mobile phones and of these 71% access the internet daily (De Lanerolle, 2012). According to a Unicef study on the South African Mobile generation, there is a market penetration of mobile phones of 120% which when compared to the 2001 figure of 32% shows exponential growth (Unicef, 2012). While this indicates more phones than people, the real penetration of ownership is estimated by World Wide Worx (2012) to be closer to 80% of the population with about 40-million South Africans using mobile phones. Around 10 million phones are sold each year and it was predicted that 50% of these would be smartphones in 2013 (Goldstuck, 2012). In 2010, 21% of electronics sales in South Africa were mobile handsets (Unicef, 2012).

The penetration of smartphones greatly increases the type of content audiences can access and as alluded to early there is now far greater competition for radio from other sources and platforms for news, information and music. The increase in mobile uses and ease of access to multiple sources could and will have implications for radio. This research looks to find out how commercial music radio stations are adapting to this shift in technology and using Twitter for content and relating to their audience and how this is being used on-air, if at all. The networked audience is now a reality and to better understand the potential shift, it is important to first understand how Twitter has impacted on the traditional model of journalism and from this draw an understanding into how it could potentially affect music radio given the lack of research into music radio. Much has been written on the subject of journalism and new media by writers such as Hermida (2010), Newman (2009), Murthy (2011) and Rosales (2012) and the next section will explore this.

Twitter's impact on Journalism and music radio

The power dynamic between traditional media and the audiences who consumed their products has changed (audience and the fourth era). Much of the literature has focused on the impact of the changes that new media and Twitter have on traditional journalism, news production and radio newsrooms, including studies and papers by Hermida (2010), Newman (2009), Murthy (2011), Rosales (2012), Domingo (2008). This section will start by investigating the effect of new media, specifically social network sites (Twitter) on journalism and consider this when looking at the potential impact it may have on commercial music radio which up until now has largely not been researched.

The immediacy of Twitter and its ability to share and disseminate information has been highlighted in these and other studies that look at social media and news journalism. Some examples include the Iranian elections of 2009, the Oscar Pistorius trial and the downed US Airways flight in 2009. In all of these instances, Twitter was used by ordinary people to break news, share news and disseminate information (Domingo, 2008). The question that arose for scholars was whether this was indeed the rise of an army of citizen journalists or merely another tool for traditional media to pick up on breaking news (Newman, 2009; Murthy, 2011). In the case of the downed US Airways plane that crashed into the Hudson river, the Twitter user @jkrums posted a picture of the downed plane floating in the river. Within 30 minutes of posting this picture, he was being interviewed on MSNBC and from there on being used by several media outlets to provide updates. He did not become a journalist as a result nor did he get remunerated for his work as a journalist would have. The public it was found ultimately took interest in the story and not the original source. Murthy puts it: "Twittering citizen journalists are ephemeral, vanishing after their 15 minutes in the limelight. In most instances they are left unpaid and unknown" (2011: 786).

Newman (2009) in a study entitled "The rise of social media and its impact on mainstream journalism" looked at how newspapers and broadcaster in the United Kingdom and the United States were responding to what he termed "a wave of participatory media". The study looked at how journalists at leading news organisations were responding to social media and how they were using audiences to research and tell stories. It further investigated the impact on journalism practices, changing dynamics in news creation and crowdsourcing. The study looked at the approach of several mainstream news organisations to this changing landscape and the Iranian street protests that followed the elections in 2009 as well as the G20 protests in the same year were used as case studies. The Iranian protests brought to light many new challenges for journalists most notably: the verification of sources, balance in opinion, factual accuracy, establishing timelines of events as well as editorial pressure to publish (Newman, 2009).

At the peak of the protests the BBC received five videos a minute, with CNN receiving 6000 videos in total. Much of this content was uploaded and disseminated online and the sheer volume of content posed challenges for journalist in terms of selection and storytelling. CNN only approved 200 of the 6000 videos for use, discounting many videos due to inaccuracies, bias and lack of authenticity. There was a huge amount of noise and false information generated online, some of which was deliberately placed and the challenge that they faced was in discerning what was important, accurate and critical to the overall story. The conversation on Twitter was overwhelmingly in favour of the opposition candidate Mir Hossein Mousavi and some glaring inaccuracies were amplified on social networks. Most notable was the reporting that Mousavi was under house arrest when in fact he was just being watched as well as reports of 3-million protestors having turned out in Tehran when in fact it was a few hundred thousand. The shift for mainstream media journalists was not to be the first to publish or break the news as that was already happening around them but rather to be best at verifying and collating the story (Newman, 2009).

The traditional media outlets become the curators of the story, providing the insight, analysis and collation of events (Newman, 2009). Twitter it was concluded by Murthy (2011) is merely a useful tool for news to be broken to a wider audience but the need for more detailed analysis and information is still fundamental to satisfying the interest of the public who latch onto the story.

In his paper 'Twittering the News", Alfred Hermida concludes by saying: "Twitter is, due to the speed and volume of tweets, a noisy environment, where messages arrive in the order received by the system. A future direction of journalism may be to develop approaches and systems that help the public negotiate and regulate the flow of awareness information, providing the tools that take account of this new mode for the circulation of news" (2010: 304). So in other words journalists would become the sense makers rather than the reporters of news. They would create the collective sum of knowledge that were contained in the micro fragments spread all over Twitter (or other network) and bring meaning/interpretation to the data (Bradshaw, 2008). Deuze describes this as a shift from the individualistic top down mono-media journalism to team based participatory journalism (Deuze, 2005). It would seem that for journalists and media organisations that they are now nodes within a broader networked public, that the shift for journalism is to become central source of reliable understandable content for other networked individuals (Jenkins et al, 2013).

The way in which Twitter has been used by news media is interesting to my research as it shows that individual voices are increasingly being used in breaking news events and in the overall story-telling process. The demotic turn as described in a paper by Willems (2012) celebrated the increased presence of the common man in media but cautioned as to the quality of the contribution and the overall need to assess the nature, intensity and quality of participation. Quantity does not necessarily equate to quality nor does it point to better content for audiences of news outlets. Willems (2012) in fact found that audience participation via digital platforms in Zambia was in fact situated within the broader corporate logic in which adding voices of the audience is not just about content but also about growing the commercial strategies and revenue (data mining). Further to this she concluded that while new media are considered interactive, there is nothing inherently participatory in the use of the internet and these platforms as audience input is still channelled through traditional organisational decision channel. Her conclusions are interesting and something that should be kept in mind when analysing the data obtained from the two stations in this research. She used the AIP model put forward by Capentier (2011) which this research will also use (Willems, 2012). Ligaga and Chiumbu (2012) while acknowledging the positive roles of ICTs in expanding and transforming radio publics also draw caution due to the realities of access of the digital divide in South Africa. They applied a cultural studies approach to their investigation into three stations (Bush, SAFM and 702) and how ICTs have transformed radio practices in terms of institutional cultures and audience engagement. They found that listeners are still largely dependent on radio stations to guide participation in the various radio cultures (Ligaga and Chiumbu, 2012). The stations that they analysed were talk stations and not music stations.

This research is not however concerned with journalism and news production but with commercial music radio and their use of Twitter within the broadcasting activities. It is useful to see and highlight the impact on journalism to understand the way it has impacted on the production of news and the dissemination of content through this platform.

The question that arises at this point is whether this will prove to be the same for commercial music radio use of tweets and their use of Twitter on-air. What shape or form will it take and what content will be used, if any? There has been no major research pertaining to music radio programming as per the focus of this research and through this investigation it is hoped some insights into this space will be uncovered. Before considering the research on music radio and Twitter, it is necessary to consider how music radio is different to journalism by investigating the key characteristics of music radio, the role of speech in the format and the audience involvement.

It has been pointed out by several radio scholars and writers such as Crisell (1994), Douglas (2004), Shingler and Wieringa (1998) that speech plays an important role in music radio. It is Shingler and Wieringa (1998), who sum it up best by saying that the role of speech in commercial music radio is the primary code of radio that provides identity and uniqueness. However they also state the importance of non-verbal codes such as music, noise and sound effects to the medium, without which they say radio would lack depth and detail. Without words, radio would in their opinion be "disadvantaged, rendered obscure, ambiguous and virtually meaningless" (Shingler and Wieringa, 1998:51). There would be nothing but wall-to-wall music and while the genres and perhaps style may vary, the stations would lack any distinctive identity that would appeal to audiences (Shingler and Wieringa, 1998).

One gospel station would sound the same as the next barring maybe the tempo or style of gospel played at certain points during the day. It is the verbal information provided by speech that provides the unique, intimate and appealing elements that attract specific audiences (Crisell, 1994). Each station builds the elements of speech to provide a signature offering to their audience. The language is carefully constructed to reflect the audience that they target with their product. The delivery of speech content is first person and focused as if in a personal conversation with one individual (Cignell, 2009). Certain elements such as news, sports, weather and factual updates do not usually include the personal cues. The same could be said of interviews and radio dramas. For the vast majority of music radio, however, speech is delivered by the presenter directly to the listener (Shingler and Wieringa, 1998). The presenter's voice, tone, pitch, emphasis, accent and articulation play a critical role in the connection with the listener and in conveying emotion, relevance, etc. The content that is presented is what draws in audiences and it is the style and manner of delivery that determines resonance.

Susan Douglas (2004) talks at length about the personal connection that radio creates with each listener and how the listening experience is defined in unique way for each person. An individual listener can react as they please to the content received without it impacting on the listening experience of others who are consuming the broadcast at the same time. The emotional impact of the content may be the same or different for each listener but they are part of a broader community. While the interactivity of radio has often been extolled, the truth is that a listener cannot just comment in response to what the station broadcasts. Audiences cannot use the same radio device that they use to listen to talk back, provide feedback or input, in other words the technology is not built for two way communication (Hendy, 2000). If they were angered by what the presenter said for example, they may shout in their living room and punch the wall, but the station and other listeners would not hear it or be aware of their anger. The only way that they would be able to be heard by everyone was if they were put live on-air via phone line or in studio (Douglas, 2004).

Radio links the individual to the collective and provides a sense of community and identity. The knowledge that others like you are connected at the same time is comforting and decreases sense of isolation when alone. Douglas (2004) further adds the importance of radio in nation building and sense of shared purpose or identity through its ability to link multitudes of people simultaneously to the same event, conversation or news item. Radio linked the listener to events and other people through the conversations and broadcast content. The phone-in was by far the most useful tool for interactivity on radio as it allowed listeners to input on the programme. As Shingler and Wieringa (1998) state, the phone-in represents for many the knowledge that they could engage if they wanted to and for most they are happy to listen in on the call as if overhearing a conversation in the office or at the train station. Social media opens a platform through which someone may express their emotion or opinion on a broadcast and although this may not go live on-air, it will go live to a community of individuals who have gathered around the station and its content (Bonini and Monclus, 2015). Music radio is part of this networked public through platforms like Twitter and we explore what research has been done in this area next in relation to music radio.

As mentioned earlier, very little research has been done into the impact of Twitter on music radio practices, audience relationship and content. However a few studies exist which can be noted here although the core focus does not directly relate to the specific questions put forward by this research report. Fergusan & Greer (2011) included music stations in their research into how local radio stations in the United States were using Twitter, however, the study focused mainly on the relationship between format and interactivity as well as the relationship between format and content postings. They further looked at the level of interactivity between audience and radio station's Twitter sites but did this in relation to audience size. The study lacked insight into the way the music stations relate to their audience and the impact/use of Twitter on programming content.

In a non-academic study, Brandwatch conducted research in 2013 into the impact of Twitter upon the radio sector in the United Kingdom and United States. This study looked at Twitter activity in relation to audience size, and the types of tweets stations made as well as their response to audience tweets. It did not look at the use or effect of Twitter on on-air content or how this content was treated or handled by the stations.

The 2013 Brandwatch study found that, on average, only 0.1% of radio listeners' tweet about a radio station in the UK. The study also found 88% of those who mentioned broadcasters on Twitter were loyal to one radio station. Radio stations primarily use Twitter as a broadcasting platform, not for engagement. The more active broadcasters are on Twitter, the more frequently they are discussed. The vast majority (79%) of radio station @mention tweets were directed at celebrities, not listeners. Tweets receive three times the interaction when a celebrity is mentioned, and boosted engagement when using links, pictures and hashtags. Followers are 20% more likely to engage with a presenter's Twitter account than a radio station's Twitter account. Radio stations aren't always active at the same time as their audience on social media (Brandwatch, 2013).

In the US, 93% of those who mentioned broadcasters on Twitter were loyal to one radio station. On average, 0.3% of radio listeners tweet about a radio station in the US. 41% of radio @interactions are with celebrities, 32% with brands and 10% with followers. Tweets receive ten times more interaction when a celebrity is mentioned and 33% less interaction when a brand is mentioned. Pictures and links encourage almost 70% more interaction than those without. However, tweets with hashtags received 43% less engagement. Followers are 54% more likely to engage with a presenter's Twitter account than a radio station's Twitter account.

When it came to the type of content that users interacted or engaged with, what's playing accounted for 30%, talk about presenters 15%, song requests 30%, show content 12% and celebrities 13%. Music is as important as ever, with 60% of all listener mentions of radio relating to the songs played. Radio stations do not tend to reply to the comments aimed at them, their shows or their presenters. They seldom engage with listeners at all, using Twitter almost exclusively as a broadcasting platform. Pop music stations interacted with their audience most, and sport the least. On average there was a 285% increase in the engagement rate when a tweet contained an image. There was a 47% increase in interaction when there was a link in the tweet, and a 73% boost when using a hashtag. Listeners are most active on Twitter at the start and at the end of the traditional working day. Radio stations are not always active at the same times, suggesting some disparity between the organisations and their audiences.

In another study Willems (2012), while not directly looking at music radio and content, asks an important question about what exactly the audience are participating in when they do take part via digital platforms. She was investigating participation in radio in Zambia, what this meant, what form it took and exactly what process they were participating in. She identified a double edged sword in that while the digital platforms had opened up access and increased the potential participation of the audience in radio, it had also caused stations to generate revenue by using their data trail and information.

She makes a very important distinction between solicited and unsolicited participation and this is something that this research shall bear in mind when looking at participation by the audience. In the first, the audience is invited to take part and they enter a process of managed participation in which the station has the final say as to the level of their involvement and how that takes place. In the second, they choose to engage as and when they please and content can be far from the on-air discussion. The second form is interesting for my research, as it could potentially reveal how the networked audience influences or affects programming and on-air content. This was not the focus of her study however. She also did not examine the power relations in her study it is useful to keep this concept in mind in the analysis of the data of this research and we shall explore this briefly next.

Programming, gatekeeping in radio and changes in media power

Up until the arrival of social media broadcast programmers as well as staff have acted as gatekeepers for content, deciding what is used and what is not. They define the access for their audience and the parameters within which they can engage. Callers are often only allowed to engage on the topic at hand and not what they would like to engage on at that specific point. SMS, e-mail and other forms of communication are received and filtered for use on-air. This is to ensure that the programming content plan is executed, audiences built and expectations maintained. This approach to content is a very traditional and linear model of mass communications, from producer to consumer (Schackman, 2013).

Audience involvement is controlled and screened by the station and therefore certain "undesirable" voices or content could be excluded from the on-air programme and other opinions simply not allowed. Many opinions may not be represented as listeners choose not to engage due to control. Radio programmers are responsible for organising content to attract specific audiences and to ensure that the station complies with regulatory framework which means that they are meticulous in their control (Schackman, 2013).

The development of the internet has further added Social Media, and the focus of this research, Twitter, to the means of participation or involvement by the audience in content and with the radio station. Unlike the above mentioned tools, Twitter is publicly accessible, not controlled or owned by the station and so content that is posted by users is visible to other users of the network. The station can merely decide what content to use on-air or acknowledge online, but all content published by users is visible online (Bonini and Monclus, 2015). This is a fundamental shift in the relationship and balance of power and it means that stations have to or should have to think carefully as to how they use content from this medium as part of their on-air conversation. Radio has adopted Twitter relatively quickly and incorporated it as part of its offering and the changing dynamic and use is in a process of evolution (Bonini, 2014).

The end of the first decade of the 21st century has seen the lines between media producers and consumers become increasingly blurred with the once unidirectional broadcast becoming fragmented into several multidirectional broadcasts. The balance of power seems to have shifted and the consumers of media become the producers of media in their own right. Terms such as user generated content, participatory media and citizen journalism have been used by traditional media to explain the phenomenon (Mandiberg, 2012). Bruns (2008) termed them produsers, as they are able to receive and produce content.

Technological developments in this decade most notably the mobile phone (smartphone) and the internet have squarely placed the tools of production in the hands of the people formerly known as the audience (Rosen, 2006). Smartphones are fully equipped mobile media production devices with which one can create media and through which one can disseminate the finished product. The cost of these devices has steadily declined and their penetration into the market increased to around 40% in SA with an expectation that by 2016 this figure would reach 60% (World Wide Worx, 2015). In addition to the proliferation of mobile phones, software developments in the online space have created platforms for the dissemination of self-created media material as well as the possibility to build one's own network (Schackman, 2013).

The audience is no longer reliant on the radio station for their access to news, information and music. In the past there may have been competition from other sources such as television and newspapers however radio had always had an edge in that it could be consumed whilst on the move and while doing something else. This provided the medium with an advantage in its provision of content to a mobile audience. The smartphone and the internet are fundamentally changing the mobile space that radio once enjoyed. The audience can now access news online anywhere, anytime from a range of sources: websites, news feeds, social media, blogs, etc. Music too can be accessed via many different sources such as music streaming service providers Spotify, Soundcloud, Youtube and many more. They have a variety of choices as to how they obtain this content which range from the traditional radio broadcasters and their gatekeeping to personalised feeds as well as recommendations from friends and people they choose to trust (celebrities, independent producers, ordinary people, etc). They decide whether they want their messages mediated and what content they would like to see (Bonini, 2014; Shirky, 2009). On Twitter, they can decide who to follow, what content searches or catchments to make as well as who or what to mute or block. They create the filter for content and the challenge for radio is how to provide value in this digital world, attract its listeners as well as how best to engage with their audiences in these spaces. The audience does not only consume, but they create, share and build their own audiences. They build multi-layered networks of sources that they trust for things that they want to have access to (Newman, 2009).

The key it would seem is for radio to become part of the circle that users trust and value for content (an important node on the network). This is the same trust that they previously enjoyed without question prior to the advent of the internet and its plethora of software tools that provide access to content. The internet is always on and radio always there and presumably so is the potential audience and therefore the possibility for greater participation in radio content. Carpentier makes a useful point that there is a distinct difference between interaction and participation and that access and interaction do not necessarily equate to power for audiences in content production. This distinction is important for the focus of this research in that we are investigating how Twitter is used by commercial radio and if it impacts on content on-air or online in anyway. This we investigate Carpentier's model as it will form part of the basis of the anaylsis of output from this study.

Access, interaction and participation

The fourth age, of the networked audience has opened up the potential for a period in radio history when audiences can interact and participate with radio in an ever increasing manner as well as themselves become produsers of content (Bonini and Monclus, 2015). However there is a very mixed use of the words interaction and participation within communication and media studies, something that has led to what Gallie termed an "essentially contested concept" and "the proper use of which inevitably involves endless disputes about the proper uses on the part of their lives" (1955: 169).

Carpentier (2012) outlines how it "requires careful manoeuvring to reconcile the conceptual contingency with the necessary fixity that protects the concept of participation from signifying anything and everything" (2012: 174). Carpentier (2011) draws on the articulation of participation in minimalist and maximalist democratic theory in which participation's crucial and intimate connection with power and the redistribution of power is emphasised. He argues that power is one of the key elements of participation, that participation involves specific actors and that concept of participation is dependant and itself part of the power struggles in the society. He uses these notions drawn from democratic theory to ground the concept of participation in the AIP (access, interaction and participation) model in order to assess the audience involvement in media production processes. There is a need according to Carpentier to distinguish between the possibilities of participation (access and interaction) from actual participation (Carpentier, 2011).

In the AIP model, access becomes articulated as presence that in a variety of ways are related to four areas: technology, content, people and organisations. Access means achieving presence to technology or media content or feedback to traditional media. To illustrate the point, Carpentier (2012) outlines how in digital divide discourse; the focus is placed on access to media technologies (ICT's), which in turn allows people to access media content. There is also an element to which access is meant to mean feedback. In terms of the AIP model it implies gaining a presence within media organisations, which in turn generates the opportunity for people to have their voices heard (feedback). With the focus on media production, Carpentier (2012) explains, access still plays vital role in "describing the presence of the media (production) technology" (2012: 173) and "of media organisations and other people to co-produce and distribute the content" (2012: 174). Access has both production and reception elements.

Interaction may be understood as interaction between audiences, or audience and technology (co-creation) or audience and media organization, and is not always individual but may be collective as is the case with media consumption. Interaction is the second condition of possibility which highlights the social-communicative relationship that is established with other humans or objects. Although there may be a power element, this element is not translated into a decision making process.

Carpentier (2011b: 24) says "key defining element of participation is power. The debates on participation in institutionalised politics and in all other social fields, including media participation, have a lot in common in that they all focus on the distribution of power within society at both the macro-and-micro-level. The balance between people's inclusion in the implicit and explicit decision making processes within these fields, and their exclusions through the delegation of power (again implicit or explicit) is central to the discussions in all fields". Participation deals with participation in the production of media output (content related participant) and in the media organisational decision making process (structural). True participation by the audience in media is when the listeners are recognised as having a certain amount of power in the decision making process of content creation (what should be broadcast) or even in the editorial or business choices. Participation is not the same as access or interaction. Interaction would be replying to the host's call to action (SMS, tweet, etc) while liking their tweet, retweeting would be considered engaging with their radio content. Participation would be the co-creation of the content that was tweeted in the first place by the station. In this third participatory level of the AIP model, the power is equal between the media organization and the audience and the decisions are made collectively.

In this research, I am investigating two commercial music stations and their use of Twitter in the broadcasting activities. The specific focus of this use is on how they use Twitter to relate to the audience and how this translates on-air and online. Audience participation in radio as outlined earlier has been controlled by producers and organisations and while the audience can be heard, it has been on the terms of the radio station. Using the AIP model, one can say that there has not been actual participation for the most part but interaction. New media opens up the possibility of participation and in this research I investigate how Twitter is used to achieve this, if at all.

The AIP model is grounded in democratic theory which is very important foundation for looking at audience participation in media especially in South Africa. In South Africa, audience only began to be able to access radio for expressing their opinion/voices at the end of Apartheid which was around the same time as we entered the 4th age of the audience (the networked audience). Audiences in South Africa, for the first time were able to partake in media and gain access to platforms that could be used to build the young democracy and citizen participation.

Research methodology

The focus of this research reports analysis will be based on data gathered from a specific time period from each of these two stations (Y FM and 947). The intention is to analyse the data obtained from the 23rd and 24th of November 2015 between 3 and 6 pm on Y FM and 3 and 7 pm on 947. Data from both the station's Twitter accounts (including presenters) and on-air programme audio is required in order to effectively answer the question/s. Content analysis will be used to process and subsequently interpret the data gathered. This method has been selected in order to ensure that there is a systematic approach to the capture and measurement of data as well a set of parameters that will yield reliability in this study and hopefully future studies. The content categories used in this analysis have drawn from the research done by Ferguson and Greer (2011) into how local radio stations in the U.S. are using Twitter. These have been expanded to enable more depth and understanding of how Twitter is being used. Bryman (2008) was used to develop the coding schedule and coding manual and these are outlined later in this section. The following methods will be used to gather data from 1. Twitter and 2. The on-air programme:

1. Data from Twitter
    a. A data analysis tool will be used to gather statistical data from the stations Twitter feeds during the period of analysis. The tool selected for this purpose is: twitonomy.com. The reason for the selection of this tool is that that it provides comprehensive statistical data on an individual user's account as well as a record of every Tweet received or sent during the period. Twitonomy.com will provide statistical data that includes: the number of tweets, the number of mentions, user reach, influence, follower stats, demographics, device/platform used to Tweet, etc. While this study will use one analytics tool in the analysis of data, tweetarchivist.com will be used as reference to check that the total number of tweets captured by twitonomy.com is correct. This will enable cross referencing of data as well as to determine the validity of total data gathered. This tool is being used to gather the statistical data on the two station's Twitter accounts and will not be used for the interpretation of the content data (see part 1b & 2).
    b. Tweet Capture: all tweets during the time period will be captured using twitonomy.com and content analysis method used to analyse these tweets. This will broadly classify the content into the following categories: Promotional (ad/branding/station content), Music (whats playing/requests/artists), News (current affairs, sports, weather, traffic), entertainment (gossip, celebrities, etc) and personal or other. See later coding schedule for details.

In parts a and b above, the following questions will be looked at when analysing the data: Is content that is directed at the station on Twitter utilised as a component of on-air content by the presenter? When investigating this question the following will be considered:

a. How often does the presenter use tweets directed at the station in their on-air content? (More specifically the content put forward by the presenter).
b. What percentage of on-air presenter content relates to tweets at the station? In other words the percentage of content that is directly attributable to Tweets and clearly identified as a contribution from Twitter by someone other than the presenter.
c. Of content directed at the station on Twitter how much of this was initially started by the station's own tweets? So did their followers interact as and when they wanted or was it as a result of being prompted?
d. Is this content acknowledged as a contribution by a listener in the same way they would if it were a caller? So does the presenter actively mention the source of the Tweet by username as one would a caller's personal name.
e. Is it used by the presenter in the overall conversation as a type of audience participation in the programme?

What are the main topics of conversation on Twitter as tweeted by the station, presenter and audience? In other words are they promotional [ad/branding/station content], Music [what's playing/requests], Celebrities, news, etc?

f. What kind of content receives the most attention? Does it contain just text or elements such as pictures, links and or hashtags?
g. What kind of content does the station tweet?

2. On-air
    a. Audio for the time period will be recorded. Once recorded the audio will be listened to and presenter links analysed. The presenter links will be analysed and classified using the content analysis method applied to the Twitter content (1b).
    b. Data (content) will then be compared in discussion and analysis of the Twitter data.

3. Brief interviews with the personality/manager will take place if and where possible in order to understand their perception and use of Twitter. Where no possible, I shall draw from material published by stations or individuals pertaining to this. Possible Questions:

Y FM (Some possible questions)

1. What kind of content do you find gets the most attention from your followers and listeners on Twitter?
2. Do you use Twitter to research topics and content ideas? If yes, could you perhaps provide an example and walk me through the process of execution?
3. To what extent do you plan your Tweets prior to broadcast and are they scheduled?
4. Do you have a specific strategy pertaining to the posting of content on Twitter during or for the show? Set targets?
5. What is your thinking around re-tweeting of users who tweet you and station during the broadcast? Both from your account and the station's
6. When do you choose to use Tweets over SMS, Phone or Facebook in the on-air discussion?
7. Which medium do you feel gets the best response from your audience? (phone, sms, twitter, facebook, e-mail).
8. Do you think that those tweeting are actively listening to your show or simply replying to the conversation online? Some feel that being part of the online conversation is still being part of the station conversation as it is part of the overall brand, what are your thoughts?
9. Your show uses two main hashtags to identify itself #therawrush and #TRR, why two and not one consistent one? Reason I ask why you do this is because it fragments the traffic and decreases possibility of trending?
10. During the period of analysis, there was a campaign for Takealot.com. Many of the Tweets seemed to be automated and user profile very different to the usual Y FM audience member (age, race, etc). This campaign tended to spam your timeline during drive but drive wasn't running the competition. What was the thinking or agreement? Did you control it?
11. Is the BBC minute Tweet automated?

947 (Some possible questions)

12. What is your vision as station for the use of Twitter by presenters?
13. What is the directive given to presenters for the use of Twitter on-air and online?
14. Do you set specific targets or goals for presenters/shows and what are these? If you can reveal specifics that would be great, if not then more generalized approach to this.
15. How are personal presenter accounts viewed by the station? Are they seen as part of the 947 brand? Are they monitored?
16. In the two days analysed, not one Tweet was utilized in the on-air discussion by the presenters despite users responding to contact either tweeted or mentioned on air. Content used from listeners/responders was mostly from the SMS line and/or phonecall. Is this just an anomaly or is content from Twitter not incorporated as part of the on-air discussion?
17. From the data gathered, the station seldom re-tweets/replies to user content or contributions on Twitter and the ones replied to do not seem to suggest specific focus or policy. Can you clarify or elaborate?
18. Do you think that people would engage more with you on Twitter if there was more engagement or acknowledgment by the station?
19. What kind of content do you find gets the most attention from your followers and listeners on Twitter?

20. Do you use Twitter to research topics and content ideas? If yes, could you perhaps provide an example and walk me through the process of execution?
21. To what extent do you plan your Tweets prior to broadcast and are they scheduled?
22. There were 3 Tweets in the 2 days pertaining to news content framed by #newsbyte. How are these Tweets decided upon and who does them (EWN or 947?). What is the thinking behind newsbyte Tweets and why are they not more predictable or consistent? They almost seem random, hence the need for clarity in order to understand.
23. Can you explain the vision for LDR and elaborate on how requests are directed to the playlist? From the Twitter data and way that LDR is setup on your website & mobisite, it would appear as if requests are limited to whats on your playlist and/or in your music database. Listeners are notified their song is about to play rather than the station actually playing their music requests. Could you clarify this process?
24. Do you think that those Tweeting the station are actively listening to 947 or simply replying to the conversation online? At times it could be both but what do does your gut tell you or stats reveal regarding this? Some managers, feel that if someone is part of the online conversation, they are still part of the station conversation as it is part of the overall brand, what are your thoughts?
25. Lastly, what is the Station's policy regarding use of 947 Twitter account?

Coding schedule to be used to capture 1b and 2a

1. Item Number	2. Content Category of Tweet	3. Tweet Elements	4. Origin of Tweet	5. Station Response	6. Content credit	7. Time Allocated

Coding Manual

1.Item Number (sequential unique number to be allocated to each Tweet captured)

2.Origin of Tweet

a) Unique
b) Response to station Tweet
c) Response to station content (prompted)
d) Both (b) and (c)
e) Response to station content (on-air content not prompted)
f) Response to User
g) Nothing to do with station

3.Content Category of Tweet

a) Promotional (advertising/branding/Station content)
b) Music (what's playing/requests/artists)
c) News (current affairs, sports, weather, traffic)

d) Entertainment (gossip, celebrities, etc.)

e) Personal or none of the above

4.Station Response

a) Used on-air (mentioned and used in conversation)

b) Used Online (replied to or re-tweeted)

c) Both (a) and (b)

d) None

5.Content Credit

a) Name/handle

b) None

c) Other

6.Time Allocated (number of seconds/minutes given to that tweet)

Notes on coding schedule:

1. Where a Tweet is classified in a particular content category, any subsequent replies or re-tweets of that Tweet will result in that Tweet being coded in the same category.
2. Tweets by the station relating to show content will be classified as 5 (a). Station campaigns and commercial content will also be classified as 5 (a). In the analysis of this section 5 (a) careful attention should be paid to the breakdown of these Tweets.
3. If the call to action on-air for feedback or input by the audience includes Twitter, then responses by users/listeners on Twitter will be classified as 5 (c). If the call to action does not include Twitter, then all responses on Twitter by users/listeners that are not direct replies to any station Tweet relating to the specific on-air content will then be classified as 5 (e). If it is a reply to the station Tweet then it will be classified as it would normally 5 (b).
4. Discounted Tweets: where Tweets have nothing to do with the station, on-air content or presenter/s in the context of their show, these Tweets will be classified as 5 (g). Presenter/s Tweets and users interaction with their handle were included in the study as the presenter/s are part of the station brand and active part of the show/s being analysed. It is expected that some Tweets will be unrelated and personal in nature and these will be discounted from the analysis of content.

Limitations and shortcomings

It is acknowledged that this time period is a mere window into a moment of time within the year 2015 and so follow up studies would be required to analyse a larger time period and check consistency of the findings. While findings for the specific time period in this study may indicate certain trends or result in some conclusions based on questions posed by the research, a broader analysis of the overall stations use may reveal slightly different data. Possible limitations in the interpretation of the data may arise if the relevant person/people cannot be interviewed to clarify strategy or rationale behind certain elements. Their unavailability could result in comment or analysis that is only partial in nature and analysis that is based on the perception that the data creates. This was the case for 947 as Ravi Naidoo was unavailable despite numerous attempts and assurances on his part as was the presenter. It is acknowledged that internet connectivity and reliability of the networks to provide this access could negatively impact on the data gathered if any of the following occur: outage, limited coverage, congestion and increased costs. There could also be occasions where the tools selected exclude the capture of some data, although unlikely it is a possibility a discrepancy may arise.

This research will not be looking at questions related to Twitter as a tool for interaction with the station's audience nor whether those tweeting the station are actively listening. The research will not look at the audiences perception of Twitter and their relationship with the station nor consider specifics of this audience profile, detailed demographic or location. The focus of this report is on how stations are using Twitter looking at the effect on on-air content as well as use by station and audiences in this regard.

Results and data summary

The results and observations detailed here are drawn from the Twitter data captured during the broadcast on the 23rd and 24th of November 2015 for 947 and Y FM. The data is specific to the afternoon drive shows and does not include any other Twitter data from those days. Appendix 1 on page 63 contains all the actual Tweets captured and subsequently used in to create the data summaries below.

Findings and Analysis

The analysis and findings will be broken down into sections in order to address and unpack the questions asked by the research for each station. The comparative analysis between these two stations as well as the detailed interpretation of the findings will be included in the conclusion.

Y FM

The findings and analysis of Y FM includes data from Twitter, input from an interview with the co-host of the show, Khutso Theledi and findings/observations from the actual audio recording of the shows.

Broad overview of data

The Y FM Twitter account received a total of 2040 tweets during the two days that form part of this analysis, with 1416 of these pertaining to a commercial campaign for takealot.com. There were also 150 tweets by the station/presenters. The takealot.com campaign flooded the timeline of Y FM during the first two hours of the afternoon drive. This made analysis of the actual content pertaining directly to the show a much harder task. In the data analysis, the tweets at Y FM pertaining to the takealot.com campaign have been separated from the rest of the tweets and have been classified separately to the data summaries in the tables in the previous section. They are all classified as promotional content. These tweets have been included in the appendix 2 for reference. None of the takealot.com tweets were used on-air or acknowledged by the station during the afternoon drive show. The only mention of the campaign was through takealot.com adverts in the commercial breaks (seven ads in total). The decision to separate the tweets was made after an analysis of the tweets using timing, user/frequency, content as well as interview with the co-host revealed and suggested that:

a. Most of the tweets were pre-determined in other words they were automated. The timing between tweets by any unique user was less than a quarter of a second, often split seconds apart. Tweets by users engaging with the campaign were received in rapid batches. This is not a normal pattern for user tweets. The tweets often contained the same text but merely had a fullstop or additional character added.

b. There was a distinct disjuncture between the profile of the user engaging with takealot.com and the normal respondent to Y FM Twitter content as well as the normal user who responds to the show. Users engaging with the show content and presenters did not engage with the takealot.com campaign despite adverts playing on the show. A demographic disjuncture was observed and the conclusion reached while not scientific, as it is based on the name and profile pictures, revealed that they were mostly white and older. They also tend to tag both East coast Radio and Jacaranda which are also running the campaign. The mechanic of entry is that you tag the station you listen to, a product from takealot.com and #motherchristmas and you could win the item you have requested. The tweets mostly tagged all three stations, which is another indicator that they were scheduled rather than organic.

c. In an interview with the co-host of the afternoon drive, Khutso Theledi revealed that the campaign had nothing to do with the show and that they had no knowledge of the mechanics. She further expressed frustration at the timeline being flooded as it detracted from her ability to engage with tweets related to their show. If there was any content pertaining to Y FM, digital would have controlled it. Three tweets were observed that engaged with winners. She did however say that a spinoff of the campaign was that sometimes a non-typical user would engage with their show content as a result of seeing their handle in the campaign and then checking the station's timeline.

The tweets from the takealot.com campaign will be used as part of the final discussion and recommendations of the research report and form part of the conclusion. For the purpose of the report they have all been classified as promotional (advertorial). The analysis and findings in this section will be based on the remaining 624 tweets received by the station as well as the 150 tweets by station/presenters. In total, seven tweets were discounted for having nothing to do with the station or show over the two day period. These were mostly personal tweets by the presenter/s, barring one.

The total number of tweets by the station, which includes presenters, was remarkably similar on each day with 73 on the 23rd and 77 on the 24th. Of these tweets, 55 (23rd) and 53 (24th) were from the station's Twitter account and 18 (23rd) and 24 (24th) tweets were from the presenters accounts. While no concrete conclusion can be drawn by the similarity in the number of tweets by the station/presenters, further research may be able to find or dispel any correlation or consistency when analysing a longer time period.

What were the main topics of conversation: as tweeted by station, presenter and audience (ie: promotional, music, news, etc)?

On the 23rd there were eight unique tweets by the station, of which four were promotional, none were commercial advertising. There was one tweet for the BBC minute (news), two relating to winners of competition and one quote tweet reply to a query as to who did the traffic report. On the 24th, there were 11 unique tweets from the stations account, of which 7 were promotional with one of these being advertorial. Three related to winners for takealot.com (not show related, handled by digital at Y FM). Most of the stations tweets are promotional and relate to show content.

Promotional content that relates to show topics gets the most attention on Twitter for Y FM, with users engaging both in direct response to the station's tweet or in response to topic posed on-air. There were 134 & 166 tweets relating to promotional content, most of which was users replying, re-tweeting or commenting. This report will look at a few cases of show content later in this section. Music related tweets most are a direct response to what is playing on-air or requests were 69 (23rd) and 50 (24th) respectively. Personal not promotional, music, news or entertainment accounted for the second highest amount of tweets. Most of these were from people greeting the hosts, replying to each other or users praising the show or announcing their intention to listen or state of listening. The news category seems to account for a large number of tweets and would suggest a strong news focus, however the majority of these 119 tweets over two days are for traffic (91 plus six re-tweets), with only one pertaining to actual current affairs. The rest (18) related to sports on the 23rd.

News

Twitter is mentioned on Y FM during the traffic reports and news bulletins. At the end of each traffic report, the listener is encouraged to tweet @YFMTraffic with any traffic related problems. The number of tweets from this account varies greatly on the two days in question with 6 on the 23rd and 85 on the 24th. There is relatively no engagement on this handle or its tweets by users online with only seven re-tweets of 91 tweets. User contribution was non-existent and conclusion reached is that traffic is not something that the Y FM user tweets the station about or wants to share with their followers through a re-tweet. That does not mean to say that this content is not valuable to users/listeners and further research would need to be done to determine its value and consumption by the users/listeners of Y FM.

The Y FM news bulletins contain Twitter references at the top of each hour to the trending topics on Twitter that hour. This is merely a mention of the top three trending items on Twitter at the end of the news bulletin in that hour. The mention is more a reference for listeners than an actual news item as no details of the trending topic are provided. In the same way a headline may be mentioned without further elaboration in a half hour bulletin that promotes the full bulletin top of the hour. The only difference is that the trending topics are not elaborated on at any point within the broadcast. No news related tweets were picked up on the Y FM timeline from users during the period of analysis which suggests that users/listeners do not use Twitter to share news stories with the radio station. It would be interesting to investigate the perception of listeners about the inclusion of trending topics in the news bulletin and to see how many actually went to Twitter to find out more.

Y FM news also has a one minute news bulletin provided by the BBC. This content is paid for by Y FM and airs about seven to eight times per show. It follows the Y FM news and sports bulletins. One tweet was published from the Y FM account to promote the BBC minute. This links to the Y FM website where the audio is uploaded and updated regularly (http://yworld.co.za/bbcminute). There does not appear to be a regular mention or strategy behind promoting or interlinking this content on Twitter with only one tweet in two days. This tweet was promotional and merely shared the link to the product on the website. Current affairs is not something that receives a lot of attention on Twitter for Y FM.

Show content

The first topic that was posed by the team on the 23rd of November, they asked listeners what they thought had made Jacob Zuma laugh in parliament. The call to action was for listeners respond by calling in. The on-air discussion of this topic spanned over four links in the first hour totalling approximately 8 min 46 sec. The team used eight tweets on-air and three posts from Facebook. Despite the call to action, the team did not take a single phone call. There were a total of 47 tweets on this topic.

For the second topic on the 23rd, that of home projects assigned by parents or family at home as part of the upcoming December holidays, there were 13 tweets in total, with three being used on-air. The team took five calls and had one dropped call. Topic spanned four links including the introduction of the topic and accounted for five minutes 51 seconds of airtime. There was considerably less Twitter engagement for this topic of conversation when compared to the topic in the first hour. A similar trend was observed on the 24th when analysing user engagement on the first hour topic and last hour topics. The first hour topic pertained to crediting people for starting trends. This topic received a total of 36 tweets. The last hour topic on cravings that you have but can't afford the day before payday received only 12 tweets.

In another interesting case, DJ Cleo (artist) cancelled his interview on the 24th of November due to his brakes failing on his motorbike by sending a tweet to the hosts. He tagged them, used the incorrect hashtag for the show but did not tag the station account. The presenter replied to DJ Cleo and used the correct hashtag in her reply but there was no mention of the cancellation on-air or on the official Y FM Twitter account. The interview was promoted earlier in the show during a feature called show time, but the team did not convey the online apology to the on-air space. For the Y FM listener who was not following DJ Cleo when he tweeted or the hashtag #therawrush at the point Khutso Theledi replied, or immediately thereafter, they would be none the wiser as to why he did not show up or why the interview did not happen. This is bad for both the Y FM and DJ Cleo brand in that some listeners may feel that he stood them up, while some may believe that the team lied about him coming in for an interview in the first place. There may exist an assumption that people know he cancelled his interview because he had tweeted, but this would be dangerous ground if indeed it were the case. Again this incident shows an inconsistency in the use of the medium as part of their on-air content.

Station response to tweets

In the first hour of the first show on the 23rd, there seemed to be a direct correlation between the tweets used in the on-air discussion and the tweets that the station re-tweeted. However as the show progressed, this impression was dispelled as other users whose tweets were not used on-air were also re-tweeted. It did however suggest the possible existence of a strategy on the part of the station to acknowledge the contribution of users/listeners that had tweeted the station through replying or re-tweeting. In conversation with Khutso Theledi, she explained that they tend to use the most relevant tweets in their on-air discussion and always look to re-tweet users who they feel understand the shows content. She selects tweets and provides these to the host or reads them out herself. She further explained that they also try to re-tweet users in order to acknowledge their contribution to the show, as not all content can or will be used on-air. For her it is important to engage with listeners/users during the shows as she recognises that it means a lot to them when they get a response from the station. It also helps them to get users/listeners to form loyalty to the on-air product. She further explained that the rationale behind the re-tweets is to enable other listeners/users to catch up on the conversation if they join the show late.

A good portion of the acknowledgment is from her personal account. Interestingly, the main host, Thulisa Kanzi, does not engage with listeners/users on Twitter during the show and does not seem to Tweets that are used in the on-air content discussion all pertain to specific topics that the presenter/s have posed during the show. In the two days of analysis, they did not use one tweet that did not relate to a topic of conversation that they had posed on-air and/or online. 19 tweets were used on-air on the two days of which one was not credited as coming from Twitter but the person's name was credited as was the content. For one tweet, no credit was given. There were two additional tweets from the same user that was used as part of content on the 23rd which could not be found on the timeline. These tweets may have been made up to help stimulate conversation as Khutso Theledi indicated that if the response is low, the drive team will try to stimulate the conversation or change topic. On the two days in question, for all cases of show related topic/content there is a corresponding tweet by the station that invites people's opinions or contributions. The listener on Twitter does not directly influence content on-air and is merely used to provide comment on predetermined topics posed by the station.

When talking about the difference in the number of tweets and Twitter activity with Khutso Theledi, it came to light that from Wednesday to Friday, during the last hour of the show, there is a commercial piece of content for Captain Morgan which directly affects their ability to deliver other content. In other words, the team cannot freely converse on any topic as they can on Mondays and Tuesdays. On these days, there is little engagement. The co-host felt that the commercial content directly affected the level of engagement during the last hour of the show. However she further added that if it were valuable commercial content engagement would not fall. In other words if the content value to their listener was greater, they would engage more. While no comprehensive conclusions can be drawn from these assertions, there may be a causal link between the two. Another possible reason could be that people are commuting at that time and have left the office, home or school. This drop in engagement would need further research in order to determine the reasons as well as to interrogate if the lack of content Wednesday to Friday impacted on content delivered on Mondays and Tuesdays during the last hour.

Another interesting observation was that over the two days there was a repetition of certain users tweets in the on-air discussion. This is interesting because on commercial music radio, familiar callers or "regulars" are often heard more often than non-regular callers. There exists a loyalty to familiar callers due to their involvement in the show and the predictability of response. In a sense it provides a cushion or kind of comfort to the hosts that they have their loyal core group of listeners. They can also rely on these people to provide a response to their content. In the case of Y FM, there was a repetitive use of certain users tweets in the on-air discussion over the two days. Some users generally received a response from the station/presenters more often than other users. In one case, one user also had their Facebook post used on-air although perhaps there was just a coincidence in the name. The impact of this could be to discourage other users from trying to comment or engage on the shows content as they feel that they won't be heard.

Khutso Theledi, was slightly surprised when asked about this as she hadn't realised the degree to which they tend to favour certain users. Once it was pointed out, she quickly identified with the user handles quoted and felt the reason for this increased engagement was "because they show us love" and were "most loyal to the show". Could it also be that many listeners are comfortable simply listening in on the conversation? Susan Douglas described this phenomenon of the appeal of listening to other people's conversations with which we identify in expert detail in her book Listening In: Radio and the American Imagination (1999). Could what she described for callers apply to tweets? Khutso Theledi revealed that the drive team had in fact had recent conversations relating to the use of the same callers and were actively trying to find a way to diversify the input from the audience. She felt this would need to be extended to Twitter.

While the Y FM drive team does interact with users/listeners on Twitter and genuinely sees the medium as important to their show and audience, they do not reply to tweets outside of the content that they have posed nor is their on-air content influenced by any unsolicited tweets. In the two days analysed, there were several tweets that went unanswered. Most notable were:

1. Question from user @nthabi_sengg as to how she could donate towards the #gearup campaign (This is a charity campaign Y FM was running).
2. @_MrJantjies_ requested information about Y Academy application dates but received no input from the brand.
3. There were three requests for playlisting, with no response. The team did not refer the users to the music compiler or provided procedural information.
4. Several users requested songs and received no response.

From an auditory perspective, tweets read out on-air lack the texture and personality of callers. Things such as sarcasm, wit, cynicism, tone, pronunciation and accent are lost in translation. The delivery of the tweet by the host/s in conversation can and in my opinion does determine the way in which it is interpreted or received by the audience. That said however, tweets make a valuable contribution to the on-air product and their use on-air coupled with online acknowledgment would seem to encourage engagement. It also provides additional opinions in the conversation and opens up an alternative place for input.

The findings and analysis of 947 in this section will include data from Twitter and findings/observations from the actual audio recording of the shows. Despite numerous attempts and requests for interviews and agreement to do so, no response from the 947 was forthcoming.

Broad overview of data

947 tweeted 22 times on the 23rd of November and 25 times on the 24th of November with the presenters tweeting 10 and 20 times respectively. The majority of tweets from the stations Twitter account on both days were for Listener Driven Radio with nine per day. Of the 18 unique tweets on the 23rd, 50 % are for LDR, seven are promotional of which three were commercial content, one was for news and one promoted the station application. On the 24th, the station had 19 unique tweets of which nine were for LDR, seven were promotional two of which were commercial content, two pertained to news and one promoted the station application.

Commercial content (adverts, paid inserts and competitions) take up 37 minutes and 44 seconds on the 23rd or 15,43% of total airtime and 35 minutes and 29 seconds or 14% of airtime on the 24th. The percentage commercial content for the 23rd and 24th of November in presenter links is 21% and 17% respectively. In terms of Twitter, 28 tweets related to commercial content on the 23rd and eight on the 24th. This is not substantially high or significant at just 22% of all Tweets on the 23rd being commercial content and 5% on the 24th.

Of overall talk time on the 23rd, 48 minutes and 11 seconds, 13 minutes and 21 seconds relates to callers. This is 27% of the overall talk time on the show with SMS accounting for just under 1%. On the 24th, the total talk time is 49 minutes and 23 seconds with calls taking up 21 minutes and 30 seconds or 43% of talk time. SMS's on the 24th account for 6,5% of talk time.

Use of tweets/Twitter as part of on-air content

In eight hours of drive time radio, Twitter was not mentioned once nor did any tweets get utilised in the on-air programming. There was no imaging on-air to promote the 947 Twitter handle or the drive hashtag (#947drive) nor messaging or communication that it is a platform for engagement. The call to action for content that the shows hosts wanted its audience to engage with was either for listeners to call in or for them to text the station (SMS). Interestingly there was no mention of Facebook, e-mail or Twitter as channels through which to comment or interact. It was surprising to find that 947 drive does not mention let alone use Twitter as a part of their on-air programming content given that the station's sales toolkit/web brochure directly sells and defines their audience in the following key ways:

1. "947 listeners are strong downloaders of music, enjoy YouTube, reading online news sites, downloading videos and tweeting. They love technology, and keep up to date with technological advances."
2. "The 947 listener is very likely to be a big social networker. They are very engaged with technology with interaction with devices and apps on a variety of platforms."

The station's sales kit directly names Twitter as a key part of their listeners matrix, yet as a touch point is not utilised or incorporated into the on-air drive shows product. Perhaps further research would reveal the use of Twitter on a more integrated or strategic level and/or find greater mention thereof but in the 8 hours of drive show that was analysed, the listening suggests that even if this was to be found that there would be an inconsistency in its use and application. Perhaps the interaction with their technologically savvy listener is via other platforms such as the 947 application, however this application is not the subject of this research report and further interrogation would be required to really pass fair comment. That said however, it is not mentioned in conversation by the presenters nor is content from the application mentioned which would suggest it is not feeding content to the show or that important to the overall matrix used by the show to engage with their listeners.

News Content

The top of the hour news bulletins at 4pm, 5pm and 6pm all feature a mention of the trending topics on Twitter in that hour. These bulletins are produced by Eye Witness News (EWN). On the 23rd there was one tweet pertaining to news and on the 24th there were two tweets. The tweet on the 24th was tweeted at 18h30 and pertained to two men who were behind the Mali attacks having been named. There was a link to the story. On the 24th, the first tweet at 18h02 related to Turkey shooting down a Russian plane and the Kremlin denying violating Turkish airspace. The tweet included a link to the story. The second tweet at 18h37 was about an Australian man thanking fans for fighting his Facebook shutdown and this tweet also contained a link. The links in the tweets direct the user/listener to the online article on the EWN site.

None of the #947newsbyte tweets were engaged with by listeners in terms of them replying to, commenting on or re-tweeting the tweet. Click through numbers cannot be ascertained. On both days the placement of these tweets does not seem to be done with any sort of predictability. They are also not breaking news related.

As such there does not seem to be a clear execution strategy behind the #947newsbyte tweets when one observes the data over the two days. Perhaps further analysis would reveal a more predictable pattern or consistent use thereof. This predictability is something that radio listeners are accustomed to through the provision of regular consistent programming that is directed at their interests, tastes and lifestyle. The tweets from the days on the #947newsbyte are all international news stories. 947 sells themselves as: "The station that brings together the pace and diversity of Joburg" and that 947 "plugs into the common attitudes of the people of the city and amplifies the energy of this remarkable place". The international focus is odd therefore and the tweets also seem to be misplaced in their overall Twitter feed. If news must be provided surely it would be more relevant to find news that affects their lives? On-air there is no mention of #947newsbyte and online (947.co.za) no presence can be found. Perhaps the random feeling that these tweets create is in some part created by the fact that they are created by EWN and not 947.

Show content

Content that is posted by the show on Twitter receives relatively low levels of response from users/listeners especially if one considers the size of the 947 audience and the size of their Twitter community. In order to illustrate this point, it is important to highlight some areas of content, the number of responses and stats around these. On the 23rd, the team asked listeners if they would go on a second date with someone who wore a bowtie on the first date. The station tweet had five re-tweets, one of which was from the presenter, four from users/listeners. It further had seven likes. There were five replies by users for this topic, none of which were used on-air and only one of which was re-tweeted/replied to online by the station. In another piece of content from the same show, the team asked what silly rules listeners had at home, school or work. The tweet received two re-tweets, one of which was the presenter and one from a user/listener. There were six replies to the content and none of these were used on-air or online by the station.

On the 24th, the team asked the listener for the dos and don'ts of the year end office party. The station tweet was re-tweeted eight times and liked 13 times. There were five replies from users, one of which was a quote of something Anele said on-air. This received most attention from users with 14 re-tweets and six likes. The show again did not use any of these tweets on-air and only used two tweets online via re-tweets from presenters account. Another content piece on the smell of seduction received only one re-tweet and seven responses. None of these were used on-air and two of which were re-tweeted by the presenter online. There is very little acknowledgment of tweets online by the station/presenters and no use or mention on-air. This could be a contributory factor in the low levels of response. With no use of content from Twitter on-air by the station and no mention of the platform during the show, the attention of the research turned towards looking at what they were using the platform for, especially in how they use it to relate to their audience. Listener Driven Radio or LDR is a good point of departure as this features is the largest single content area tweeted by the station's account with nine tweets per day.

Listener Driven Radio is a music alert service that notifies listeners when songs that they have requested to be alerted for are about to play on 947. By going to http://www.947.co.za/competitions/listener-driven-radio#ldr_widget or the 947 application, a listener can select songs that are on the 947 playlist or on a list of music made available under instant request section and create an alert. This alert will then be sent to the listener when their song is about to play. The alert can be sent via SMS, e-mail or as a tweet. You can also share the song that you have just requested via Twitter or Facebook.

The first impression created by the LDR platform tag and the tweets each day on Twitter was that listener driven radio was directly adding listener requests to the 947 playlist. This would be a truly novel concept if it were to be executed in such a manner as no commercial music station in South Africa has handed over control of their playlist to their listeners in its entirety. However LDR is not truly genuinely listener driven for two reasons: one. The options a listener can select appear to be predetermined. There is no place to input a desired song, only to create an alert for songs on the list found on the LDR page under instant request section. Although there are a large number of songs available for selection, it does not appear to contain songs that would disrupt the overall sound of the station. Secondly, it is a music alert system for songs on the playlist which means when it is scheduled you will hear it. It is not necessarily going to play the same day or on the show you request it on. On the drive show there is no mention of LDR by the presenter/s or of a listener choice being selected. The LDR feature does not relate to a specific feature or content area for the requester other than the alert and subsequent airplay moment. Perhaps at other points in the 947 programming there are such focuses and more research into the overall programming may reveal this.

Based on the data found in this study, the naming of this service seems somehow misplaced. Although one could say that LDR provides a valuable service to listeners as listeners are able know precisely when their "requested" song is going to play on-air, it does seem somehow cynical, perhaps disingenuous. Can a listener truly alter the playlist? Based on the evidence of this research it would seem they cannot.

In summary, based on the auditory evidence gathered from the 23rd and 24th of November, 947 does not use Twitter as a part of their on-air programming. There is no acknowledgment of the medium on-air and contributions are never used by the station as a part of conversation. On Twitter, the station's content is mostly promotional for show content. Even though LDR is classified as music related content, it is in fact alerting a user to content and therefore also in part promotional. The tweets pertaining to show content are not written in such a way as to direct users to the on-air product and make them tune in. They invite comment or input but that input or comment is not used.

Conclusion

This research report was an exploratory study into two regional commercial music stations (YFM and 947) and their use of Twitter as a tool to relate to, interact with and enable participation from their audiences. Of particular interest was why they are using it, what they are doing with it and how this affects the on-air content pre, during and post broadcast, if at all it does. In the age of the networked audience, these questions could illustrate the possible shift in the station's production processes and even the relationship between commercial music radio and their audience. Twitter was selected due to the similarities between it and radio, namely: immediacy, personalisation, intimacy, audience, participation segmentation as well as the knowledge that others are consuming what you are consuming at the same time (a sense of community). The big questions that the research report hoped to answer in relation to tweets, audience and on-air content were: what content would be used, if any? How would it be used and what percentage of on-air content would relate to tweets? Would this content be as a result of station started topics or user started topics and would it be used as a part of audience contribution by the audience? How has the relationship between audience and station changed and evolved and has this impacted on the production process. Another area of interest was what content would receive the most attention and what sort of content the station tweets/uses.

To investigate these, two regional commercial stations, Y FM and 947 which broadcast in same geographic area were selected and the data captured as well as analysed. Outlined in this section are the conclusions drawn from the analysis.

Y FM

Y FM directly incorporates the responses of users/listeners from Twitter in its on-air broadcast. These responses are exclusively related to on-air topics that the show has started on that particular day. In the two days analysed, they did not use any content on-air that was outside of their predetermined topics or content. Online the same was true except that they also responded to content relating to promotion of the show or the hosts.

The contributions by users/listeners in the on-air content are selected by the stations host/s and Khutso Theledi explained that she selects those tweets which best understand the topic or provide good content towards the overall discussion. This direct gatekeeping and content control by the hosts determines what tweets get on-air and in what order they are read. It also determines the way in which they are read and may impact on the interpretation of the content of the tweet/s by those listening. The tweets used on-air are always to do with the topic at hand and more often than not as Khutso Theledi admits selected from those users who they deem loyal to the show. For her side loyalty to loyal listeners is of paramount importance and using the content from consistent contributors a mechanism to reward them for their involvement in their show.

In the same way that callers are screened by commercial music radio in order to shape the content direction, ensure a caller is on topic and control the listener involvement in the content, the station now directs the conversation with Twitter and access to user's tweets being used on-air. This often ends up with the same voices, well in this case users, being represented and there were several repetitions of users and their contributions during the two days of research completed in this study. The familiar caller it would seem is now joined by the familiar tweeter. The familiar caller was something that the presenter/s were acutely aware, the same could not be said for Twitter users. For the presenters, selecting tweets for use on-air is an easier process than having to screen one caller after another. It also exposes them to less risk of content going off topic or breaching broadcasting laws or station policies. This was not something that they had directly thought about in their production or content decision making process.

As Khutso Theledi explained they can immediately see a range of responses and find the best ones for use on-air. For her the use of tweets on-air is participation by the Y FM audience in the stations on-air content. Carpentier (2012) outlined that participation deals with participation in the production of media output (content related participant) and in the media organisational decision making process (structural). True participation by the audience in media is when the listeners are recognised as having a certain amount of power in the decision making process of content creation (what should be broadcast) or even in the editorial or business choices. Participation is not the same as access or interaction. In this case, the users are interacting not participating if one uses the definition as applied by the AIP model outlined by Carpentier. They do not influence the editorial content nor co-produce the content. That said they do at times stimulate a fifteen to thirty second conversation on-air between the hosts and while some may view this as influencing content, I would disagree as it is still within the predetermined bounds of the content parameters set by the station when soliciting the response.

Many tweets unrelated to the topic at hand went unanswered, in a similar way to callers not being allowed on-air if they are off topic or happen to call at the wrong time. Like with callers, Twitter has the potential to become the place of a few users/listeners.

The responses that were used on-air were acknowledged as contributions in the same way that radio traditionally acknowledges callers. In other words the name/identity of the user was clearly identified. The main difference in their incorporation into the on-air programme versus that of calls is in the auditory aesthetic that the tweets create in the overall broadcast. There is a distinct absence of personality in the tweets that are read on-air as they lack the genuine voice of the person contributing. The voice brings tone, accent, emphasis and/or personality/identity rather than just the name of the contributor as the tweet is read by the host/s. Without words, radio is according to Shingler and Wieringa (1998:51) "disadvantaged, rendered obscure, ambiguous and virtually meaningless". There would be nothing but wall-to-wall music and while the genres and perhaps style may vary, the stations would lack any distinctive identity that would appeal to audiences (Shingler and Wieringa, 1998). It is the verbal information provided by speech that provides the unique, intimate and appealing elements that attract specific audiences (Crisell, 1994). With this in mind, the reading of tweets by presenters and the exclusion of the voice could result in a loss of translation from the original intention of the contributor as well as a lack of identity. However the extent to which that is the case if beyond the scope of this research.

There is a conscious effort by the station to acknowledge the contributions of listeners who have tweeted the station through not only the use of tweets on-air but in the re-tweeting, replying to or liking of users tweets online. The co-host Khutso Theledi spoke passionately about what she saw as the importance in acknowledging users/listeners who contribute to the show and she emphasised that she deliberately set about responding to as many as she could. As not all tweets could be used, replying to or acknowledging them online was important way of saying that their contribution was valued. The data showed that she is consistent in the application of this strategy with there being 89% of station re-tweets on the 23rd of users/listeners and 100% of her re-tweets for the same day being of users/listeners. The 24th was 97 % of station and 95% of presenter accounts re-tweets were of users/listeners. However there is an inconsistency in the approach she adopts and that of her fellow host Thulisa Kanzi who does not use the medium in the same manner. A universal strategy seems to be absent at Y FM and this is more a personal choice than a station directive.

Y FM uses more contributions from Twitter in its on-air content than it takes callers although on the 23rd callers accounted for more of the talk time than Twitter (8.2% versus 5.34%). Most of this difference was due to the contributions of two callers. It is worth noting that callers take a longer time on-air to get to the point in comparison to a tweet which is limited to a 140 characters and read out. Twitter accounts for 5.34% of talk time on the 23rd and 11.4% on the 24th. Over the two days analysed it accounts for the highest percentage of audience contribution. Callers (8.2% and 0%) then the data in this research it suggests that despite being visible to all, the tweets from users/listeners do not spark additional conversations or communities to form. This and the percentage of audience who tweet the station when prompted would suggest that tweets like phone-ins represent as Shingler and Wieringa (1998) said the knowledge that they could engage if they wanted to but that most people were happy to simply listen to the conversation or in the case of Twitter view. There may therefore be scope to expand the use of tweets by other users which my help to grow interaction and loyalty from more users/listeners. Additionally replying to, re-tweeting or liking tweets that are not related to your posed topic may also help to increase interactivity for the station.

That said, Y FM uses Twitter as part of on-air content and it adds a valuable tool to their interaction matrix. The station genuinely uses the medium for obtaining input into their on-air programming content and uses the tool to relate to and acknowledge their audience. This is interaction not participation as per Carpentier's definition and AIP model (2012). The difference that was found between the level of interactions from users/listener's in the first hour of the show to the second hour is also interesting with interaction dropping in the last hour on both days. In the analysis, two possible reasons found, firstly that commercial content in the last hour on three days of the week has very little content and this could impact on the other two days in terms of interaction as users are not expecting to be able to input. It could also be that the audience is travelling at this time and despite having mobile phones which enable them to respond; the nature of what they are doing does not enable or compel them to do so. The reasons for this drop would be fascinating and future research should investigate the reasons behind this.

It is worth noting that commercial content does impact on the ability of the show to handle or process content not only on-air but on Twitter. Their timeline during the period of analysis was flooded by a takealot.com campaign which contributed 1416 tweets. The co-host admitted that these tweets distracted and impacted on her ability to engage with users contributing to the shows content. This could also impact on those who follow the station. She further felt that the commercial content placed from Wednesday to Friday in the last hour lowered interaction and therefore impacted on their ability to interact on Mondays and Tuesdays.

In contrast to Y FM, 947, did not use Twitter as part of the on-air conversation. Audio and data from the two days analysed, revealed there was not only no use of users tweets in the on-air conversation but also no mention of Twitter as a medium through which people could interact or engage with the station. The only on-air content related to Twitter on 947 is the trending topics at the top of each hour that Eye Witness News (EWN) incorporates as a part of their bulletins. These topics however are not expanded on nor are they spoken about further on the show. With EWN providing the news, it seems from the data and audio that this is in fact a strategy on the part of EWN and not 947. In eight hours of radio, there is not one mention of Twitter by the hosts or through the use of station/show imaging. None of the calls to action involved Twitter or any other platform besides SMS or Calling in. The lack of presence for Twitter on-air could be one reason why 947 has such low levels of response on Twitter for their content.

Another possible reason could be the lack of acknowledgment online of contributions from followers/listeners. The station/presenters rarely reply, re-tweet or like users/listeners tweets which may be a reason for the low levels of response. Twitter is personal medium, that values relationships with and too others as well as the art of the online conversation. With low levels of response from the station/presenters, this may additionally contribute to the low levels of response from users. In the days analysed, no conversations developed online as side shoots of tweets sent or received by the station. The audience was mostly passive. This online activity was in direct contradiction to the way in which the station views and sells its audience. For 947, their audience is online, loves technology, are social networkers and interactive. The reality that the data presents is that their audience does not use Twitter as one of the mediums represented by the term "social networker" to engage, comment or contact the station. Perhaps Facebook or another platform is wider used by their audience. Listening evidence also suggests that this would not be the case as no other platform is mentioned during the 8 hours analysed. Further research would be required to investigate this element.

With Twitter not being used on-air as a part of programme content or as a means of audience participation, the attention of the research focused on what 947 used their Twitter platform for and how the followers/listeners used it in relation to the stations account. Music is the largest content area that the station Tweets about and this is related directly to Listener Driven Radio (LDR). LDR is a music alert service that notifies listeners when their requested song is about to play on-air. Listeners request these songs via the website or 947 application and ask to be notified via SMS, e-mail or Twitter when it will play. The research revealed that the service is not genuinely decided upon by listeners as a listener cannot request any song that they want, but only what is provided on a pre-determined list most likely linked to the stations database. There is no guarantee that the requested song will play on the same day. The tweets that alerted listeners to songs that were about to play did not have any on-air programming content around the actual playing of the song. In other words there was no mention of the listener request or it being part of a feature. LDR does appear to be somewhat cynical perhaps even disingenuous. Perhaps further research would reveal a greater link between the alert and actual acknowledgment of listener requests.

The disconnection between the perception of the audience as being upwardly mobile and online and the way in which they use Twitter as one of these online platforms is vastly apparent from this research. Low levels of response indicate an absence of an audience. With 947 having over 190 000 followers this seems odd, so the 947 audience may in fact be online as they say it is, but simply not using Twitter to relate to the station or its content. One possible reason for this could be due to the lack of incorporation into the drive shows content and the lack of general promotion of Twitter on-air. 947 could increase the uptake and engagement through more online and on-air use of user/listener content form Twitter.

There is a distinct difference between the two stations and their overall use of Twitter as a part of their broadcast. For Y FM it is part of content and an integral tool for their audience to partake in the on-air programme. Although mediated and controlled, Twitter is actively used on-air and online by the station. Based on the research, there does not seem to be a universal strategy for its application and use, however there is a conscious effort to utilise the medium as well as an acknowledgment of Twitter as an important tool for audience engagement. Twitter accounts for the greatest amount of listener contribution in the talk time of the programme. For 947, Twitter is mostly used a promotional platform to direct their followers/listeners towards the activities on-air. LDR is a good example of this type of promotional content as it accounts for half of the station's tweets. Show content posed receives low levels of response given the size of their Twitter following and is remarkably low when compared to Y FM. Twitter is not used as a means of audience participation in the on-air programme and in the two days analysed there is not one mention of the medium either by the hosts or through station imaging. There is also a low level of acknowledgment of user/listener responses online with less than 10 tweets being acknowledged online.

One reason for the difference in the low levels of response could be in how the stations are using the medium. Y FM actively uses it to elicit a response for use on-air and 947 does not. Could this be the sole factor? In other words, if 947 changed their strategy, would they see a sudden uptake? They may, however, another contributory factor may be in the actual demographics and age of their audiences. Da Lanerolle (2012) found that 51% of new mobile users were under the age of 25 and 31% between 25 and 34. Twitter is accessed 80 % of the time from mobile devices (Twitter, 2015). The two largest age groups of mobile users in South Africa from this research are the core of Y FM's audience. 947's audience is mostly over 35 years of age. This may well be another reason for the difference in the uptake of the medium and the levels of participation between Y FM and 947. That said, it would be dangerous to simply assume that the 947 audience is not utilising Twitter as much due to the age of its audience. Further research into the attitudes of the audience towards the medium and their station would be required to draw comprehensive conclusions in this regard. It may simply be down to the low levels of use.

Concluding remarks

There exists much potential for commercial music radio stations to use Twitter as not only a means of audience interaction in on-air programming but also as a means to build audience through the acknowledgment of the users/listeners who engage online in much the same way they do callers or those who text the station. The potential for growth is limited by the lack of a coherent consistent strategy for its use and while these stations may have large follower bases, the level of response to content does not even reach 1% of the followers engaging or responding to the content posted. The stations have incorporated the social networking service Twitter as part of their audience touchpoints and as a mechanism to receive feedback and or input from their audience. The current use of Twitter however does not truly allow for participation in which the listener can directly influence the production process or the content direction.

Commercial music radio listening for these two stations and particularly Y FM is now overlapped by discussions, comments, feedback and opinions on Twitter both connected to radio and separate. A new ecosystem has arisen that is hybridized and commercial music radio broadcasting now sits side by side and is integrated into networking cultures. The radio station is now a node within a much broader network. Audiences are part of many networks, rather than groups who are part of specific social and economic clusters with the old concept of fixed membership to these (Bonini and Monclus, 2015; Livingstone, 2003). This research did not however find that tweets that were not used by stations stimulated separate conversations or gained traction online.

The idea of shifting audience power with regards to content for radio would appear to be false, at least in these two cases. The content posted on Twitter while visible to a network of individuals and organisations did not in this research stimulate any online conversation or take on a life of its own. Audience tweets received very little attention even from their own networks. The thought put forward by Alfred Hermida as pertains to journalism looks true for commercial music radio in which he says: "Twitter is, due to the speed and volume of tweets, a noisy environment, where messages arrive in the order received by the system. A future direction of journalism may be to develop approaches and systems that help the public negotiate and regulate the flow of awareness information, providing the tools that take account of this new mode for the circulation of news" (2010: 304).

Commercial music radio based on the evidence has merely added an additional platform for the station and audience to interact or for information to be shared. The collaborative possibilities Twitter and other social networking sites provide have not really been realised. In the case of Y FM the tweet is slowly reducing the presence of the call which is decreasing the auditory diversity that the voice brings to the conversation. For 947, it is merely a way to promote to and alert audience on things that they deem important. Twitter does not influence the content direction of either station and forms part of the tools for audience feedback and interaction. Due to its immediacy it is the perfect companion to radio and it is not surprising that it has fitted so naturally into the day to day operations of stations. Y FM directly integrates Twitter content into the day to day on-air content however this is always solicited input and they do not use unsolicited content which falls outside of this brief. There is a conscious effort to acknowledge their audience contribution however the percentage of acknowledgment to input by users is still relatively low (19 -22%) and lacks consistency in its application. 947 does not use Twitter at all on-air and it is purely a promotional tool. There is very little online acknowledgment of users contribution and they have adopted the one to many model of communication with regards to their use of Twitter.
