ABSTRACT

The research is a comparison of two state-owned housing institutions namely, the Johannesburg Social Housing Company and the Malawi Housing Corporation and how they are contributing to affordable housing and social integration in the housing sector. It uses a qualitative approach. Objectives of the research were achieved through obtaining primary written data that was collected through document reviews from the relevant organisations and interviews. The interviews were supported through the use of secondary materials. The research strategy was comparative in nature and content analysis was used to analyse the data obtained. The study showed that integration ensures that housing institutions provide housing without segregation and discrimination bias while affordability is a mechanism for housing provision to households whose housing needs are not met by the housing market. The research results portrayed that JOSHCO's housing affordability is more meaningful than MHC's because JOSHCO offers housing within the social economic opportunities in the inner city while MHC provides housing estates outside the inner city. It also showed that both institutions consider issues of income, gender, race and disability in their housing projects and programmes to ensure that integration occurs.

DEDICATION

I dedicate this research report to my late brother Aliko Mwakalagho, known only briefly but loved and missed greatly.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I wish to thank my supervisor Dr Margot Rubin whom I consider as a blessing bestowed upon me. Her consistent support, motivation, encouragement have been the driving force in this research pursuit. I thank you for the love and care you rendered me especially when I was down you gave me hope. A special acknowledgement goes to Johannesburg Social Housing Company and Malawi Housing Corporation for allowing me to conduct my research and providing any assistance requested. A special feeling of gratitude goes to my loving parents Maggie and Reford Mwakalagho for words of encouragement. To my sisters Wezi and Sutene, thank you for being there for me always. Lastly, thank you Julius my husband, for your patience and understanding and for believing in me that I can make it.
