DSPACE

https://dspace.org/

Social reproduction in single-black-woman-headed families in post-apartheid South Africa : a case study of Bophelong Township in Gauteng.

Van Driel, Maria

2012-02-08
http://hdl.handle.net/10539/11255

Downloaded from a DSpace repository. https://dspace.org/

Acknowledgements

All knowledge is acquired collectively, in relation to others and together with others, and this was again confirmed during my research process and the writing up of this thesis. Knowledge is a 'gift from the people', for the time I had to do the research and for the research itself - through various interactions and consultations with people, with women, analysing the literature, visiting homes, conversations, attending weddings and funerals, and braaing meat at the communal fire in old Bophelong. I therefore extend my sincere thanks and appreciation to all who assisted me in various ways for their support, participation, commitment, friendship and comradeship. In particular I wish to thank and acknowledge:

- The small Bophelong community with their big hearts, who gave generously and patiently of their time and energy over a period of four years. Many local people affirmed and assisted me - with greetings, smiles, words and acts of kindness and information - shopkeepers, neighbours and township inhabitants. This has been an unforgettable experience.
- Monica Mosinki provided insight into the community humorously; and without her interpretation skills, hours of work and support, the research and this thesis would not have been possible.
- The Multipurpose Disability Centre, always welcoming, shared their lives and their ups and downs with humour and generosity. They struggle tirelessly to improve conditions for disabled people. For instance, after almost four years, the Emfuleni Council is yet to provide them with an ablution facility (amongst many other things) and their struggle continues. Their struggles and their spirit is inspiring and humbling.
- TSEBO and BOCOSFO provided support and insight into community life.
- The three local councilors - Mabuti, Justine Xaba and Eric Tshabalala, were supportive and provided information about living in Bophelong.

- Thabiso Maphike and Motlatsi Radebe of ASEDI supported the research through enabling me to participate as a 'volunteer' and do door-to-door visits in the township, unobtrusively.
- I am extremely grateful to the 'volunteers' for caring and sharing with me. The 'volunteers' – young, talented and unemployed women (and men) - do important work daily in South Africa's townships, assisting the indigent, children, the sick and the aged. Their work is largely unsung, undervalued and unrewarded. I pay tribute to all of them.
- Some 'volunteers' participated in the research as interviewers. They were trained and implemented the Survey in Bophelong in 2007 over a period of three weeks. I am deeply appreciative of their work and their names are listed in Appendix 4.
- Local community activists assisted diligently with the implementation of the Survey: the late Tankiso Matlakala, Mish Tladi, Sthembiso Nhlapo and Anti-Corruption. Mish Tladi also assisted with data capturing. Shibobo and Dieketseng Mosinki assisted with information. Portia Mosia walked the streets counting the number of taverns, crèches and churches, contained in Appendix 5.
- Eva Rampa the librarian at the Bophelong Library extended her friendship and support from the first day that I walked into the library. Together, the library staff – Maria Mollo, Isaac Tobias, Emily Nthebe (now retired), Hloni Lawrance Seboko and Elizabeth Radebe - provided a friendly and welcome relief from the sun, the wind and the rain. They supported the research and provide an example of how community services can make a difference in people's lives.
- A special thanks to Hloni Lawrance Seboko, a 'volunteer' at Bophelong Library, who accompanied me on visits throughout the township and assisted me with setting-up interviews. Seboko's support was invaluable and during this time I earned his endearment as 'gogo' (grandmother).
- Mamy Matladi facilitated the Focus Group meeting with the 13 women interviewees in December 2008.
- Professor T.J.C. Slabbert, from Vista University, shared his research and insights on the Vaal region.

- Inspector Kele from the Bophelong satellite Police Station discussed his work and conditions in Bophelong. Lorraine, together with other local shopkeepers, shared their experiences of living in the township in the 1980s and always provided friendly conversation. Mrs. Mafatle (and the late Mr. Mafatle) also provided support. Bertha and Muzi Chesane provided me with shelter when I worked late (see key informants in Appendix 1).
- Aislinn Delaney, Corinne Hoag (a Khanya College intern from the United States) and Ernestine Mokom (Khanya College) assisted me with the survey data.
- I am extremely and especially indebted to all the women I interviewed, on the social grants (Appendix 2) and the single-woman-headed families (Appendix 3), for their honesty, confidence and trust, and sharing their lives, struggles and their triumphs. These women are 'the salt of the earth' and each of their lives is a life of struggle, a 'world in itself'. The women have little opportunity to exercise their talent and creativity. With their hands, body and soul, they struggle to bring up children and grandchildren against all odds. Women such as these, through their sacrifices, nurtured those who overthrew apartheid. In their daily struggles they strive for more co-operative and egalitarian forms of living. There is no doubt that they are contributing to a new cycle of struggle.

Colleagues at Wits University were helpful and supportive and I extend my sincere thanks to all of them:

- The Department of Sociology and the Institute for Society, Work and Development (SWOP), especially Eddie Webster and Sakhela Buhlungu (now at UP);
- My supervisor, Jacklyn Cock, for support and assistance. Jackie affirms the need to link academic work to grassroots struggles.
- The Ford Foundation provided me with a three-year grant during my period of study. The Ford Fellows who studied with me, Khayaat Fakier, Hamaziripi Tamuko and Sepetla Molapo for their discussions, support and comments.

- Michael Burawoy from Berkley University provided selfless support and invaluable insights into 'the field' and in the clarification and writing of the thesis; a patient teacher, he is always ready to engage and to share.
- Luli Callinicos and Michael Burawoy for discussions on writing styles to ensure that the integrity and the life of the subjects did not get 'lost'.
- Cathi Albertyn, for her encouragement and support, and especially for comments and discussions on Chapter 6, despite her busy schedule.
- Leon Pretorious, for helping to 'break the blockage'.
- Shireen Hassim for her support and encouragement.
- My sister, Nicky van Driel and my daughter, Searatoa van Driel, for their editing skills and for diligently reading my drafts.

Khanya College, kindred spirits and comrades, are a source of inspiration and a tower of support in a difficult period. My sincere thanks to all the staff at Khanya College, and especially for their encouragement: Mondli Hlatswayo, Ighsaan Schroeder, Elijah Kodisang, Molefe Pilane and Oupa Lehulere.

Khanya College also recognised the importance of making the research accessible to the Bophelong community, and to other communities and social movements. This is how the popular series on Community Profiles was born, which includes 'Bophelo Bophelong' (Life in Bophelong). I also appreciate the College's support and time-off to complete this thesis.

I thank my friends, especially Priscilla Everson, Firoza Karodia, Angela Conway, Deborah Henley and Isabel de Gouveia for their friendship, encouragement and support. Mokesh Morar, my friend and comrade, is always supportive, affirming and available, to talk and to challenge me.

I thank the Setsi sa Mosadi trainees of Khanya College – Portia Mosia, Juliet Kabe, Kelebogile Gabonthone, Nkepeng Pitso, Sophia Maphiri and Mokgadi Raphadu – for their friendship and support.

Lastly, my thanks to my partner, Oupa Lehulere, my daughter, Searatoa van Driel, my mother, Eunice van Driel, my sisters Nicky and Esther, my family and my comrades (too many to mention) - for their love, interest and courage, for tea, for curry, for listening and for always being there.

Dedication

This thesis is dedicated to single-woman-heads in this study, in South Africa (and beyond);

To my mother, Eunice van Driel, for always making us aware of humanity and the world we live in; and

In celebration of the life of James Frederick Van Driel, (1936-2009), an organic intellectual, who first revealed to me the importance and the struggles of the single-woman-headed family; and who never forgot that he himself was raised by woman-heads. Pushed off the land in the 1930s, 'The Three Crowes' - (as he fondly called the three working class women who reared him: his mother, Claire, and her two sisters, Daisy and Alice) - together reared nine children.