

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

It is true that pursuing PhD studies is a challenging undertaking; it is however, a myth to imagine that it is a lonely expedition. At least, in my study, there are many people whose enormous contribution enabled the completion of this journey.

This study was motivated by my interest in how some aspects of the new curriculum were experienced and viewed by learners. I am therefore indebted to the teachers and learners at the two schools for the time and willingness to assist me address my selfish curiosity. I also wish to thank my institution, TNW (now TUT) for providing the space, time and resources.

I would like to express my deepest gratitude to my promoter, Prof. Jill Adler and co-promoter Prof. Renuka Vithal. Both of them provided constructive criticism, encouragement and necessary pressure at different phases of the study. At a personal level, and perhaps most importantly for my own development, they unconsciously demonstrated that expertise and humility are not mutually exclusive attributes. Many thanks to Prof. Steve Lerman (South Bank University) and Prof. Jeremy Kilpatrick (University of Georgia) for their critical comments and discussions relating to this study.

Prof. Mamokgethi Setati, Dr. Mellony Graven and Dr. Willy Mwakapenda provided me with another ‘push’ by constantly and in different ways asking the most useful, challenging and irritating question, “How far is your PhD?” They remain colleagues I look up to. Intelligent discussions I have held with my PhD classmates, Dianne Parker and Danielle Hulleit have benefited me immensely.

My family has endured many periods of my absence whilst continuously providing emotional support. I thus wish to thank my mother Emily, grandmother Linah, Aunt Mapule, little brother Dee as well as our four-legged family member, Mr. Bantheng. Lastly, and by no means least, I register my sincere appreciation of the roles played by my friends Dr. Joseph Matjila, Patrick Rasewhete and Sello Phillips for stepping in my shoes during my absence and providing me the necessary space to pursue these studies.
